'It would have required sacrifices that would be difficult to make'

Colin Powell will not stand for presidency

FROM MARTIN FLETCHER IN WASHINGTON

COLIN POWELL, the Gulf War general seen as the man most likely to defeat President Clinton, disappointed millions of supporters last night when he announced that he would not run for the White House next year.

His decision, ending months of speculation, left Senate leader Robert Dole the clear favourite to win the Republican nomination, boosted Mr Clinton's chances of re-election and prompted conjecture that Newt Gingrich might now enter the race.

The House Speaker has expressed great reluctance to run and had said he would await General Powell's decision before reaching his own. Yesterday he said he was "not even going to think about it" until the Republicans' budget battle with the White House was over.

Announcing his decision at a press conference last night, 58-year-old General Powell said that he had reached his decision after looking deep into his own soul and with much personal anguish. To offer himself as a candidate would require "a passion to run the race and win the quest; the kind of passion and commitment that I felt every day of my 35 years as a soldier, the kind of passion I do not yet have for political life.

"For me to pretend otherwise would not be honest to myself or to other people, and because such a life requires a calling that I do not yet hear, I cannot go forward. I will not be a candidate for president or any other elective office in 1996." He would, however, find other ways to contribute.

Since completing a successful book tour of America two weeks ago, General Powell had been in seclusion in his suburban Virginia home consulting family, friends and advisers on what he admitted was the most momentous decision of his life.

Polls showed astonishing levels of support for the architect of the Gulf War victory, in spite of the opaqueness of his political views and allegiances. "Draft Powell" movements had sprung up across the country, and he was deluged with pledges of support, but his wife, Alma, was adamantly opposed to him running and her fears for his safety were increased by the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. She dreaded the inevitable media invasion of her family's privacy, and wanted some stability after 33 years of upheaval as a military wife.

> "The passion and commitment I had every day as a soldier ... I do not yet have for political life"
> —Colin Powell last night

At his press conference yesterday, General Powell recognised that, saying that he had carefully considered the impact entry into political life would have on his wife and children — "the most important people in my life" — and he had concluded that it would involve "changes and sacrifices that it would be difficult for us to make at this time".

The general had also encountered opposition from Republican conservatives who feared that he would hijack their revolution. Last Thursday leaders of a dozen conservative groups held a press conference to declare their determination to fight him all the way to the nomination convention next August and to desert the party if he won.

He knew his fine reputation would suffer as opponents accused him of ending the Gulf War too early and covering up the infamous My Lai massacre during the Vietnam War, and he lacked a national organisation. "He would be going to war without any supply lines in place," said one associate. "He's much too smart a politician to do that."

General Powell's announcement was a huge break for 72-year-old Mr Dole, who leads a field of lacklustre Republican candidates, but the biggest beneficiary is clearly Mr Clinton. Recent polls had given General Powell a big lead over the President, but Mr Clinton has a comfortable advantage over Mr Dole, who had no immediate comment on the general's announcement.

The Republicans performed poorly in state elections on Tuesday, suggesting the surge that saw them capture Congress last November is tapering off as voters grow increasingly fearful of their radical agenda.

General Powell might well have revived the Republicans' momentum by attracting millions of moderate, independent and black voters, dashing Mr Clinton's re-election hopes in the process. As it is Mr Clinton will be able to claim that the general was deterred by Republican extremism and present himself as the champion of moderation.

Family jailed for plot to cover up son's death crash

BY EDWARD GORMAN AND ANDREW PIERCE

A COUPLE began prison sentences yesterday for helping their student son to avoid blame for a head-on crash in the family car in which a mother-of-two died.

David Hawker, 49, a former stockbroker, and his wife Maureen, 50, told police that their car had been stolen during a shopping trip. But their son had abandoned it at the crash scene and hid in a hedge for four hours to avoid police.

Jeffrey Hawker, 23, was jailed for three-and-a-half years and banned from driving for five years after admitting causing death by dangerous driving. His father was imprisoned for nine months for conspiracy to pervert the course of justice and his mother for three months. Father and son were thought to be beginning their sentence together in Norwich prison, while the mother was in Bulwood Hall, Essex.

Last night Jeffrey, a third year student of applied computer studies at the University of East Anglia, said in a statement: "The anguish and overwhelming sense of guilt arising from my actions is something which I do not believe I will ever lose.

"I know that I cannot begin fully to appreciate the pain, hurt, and anger of the families, friends, and others who have been affected by my actions. I realise that I have inflicted a great emptiness by causing the death of a loved one. To all those people, especially the Johnson family, I wish to express my deepest regret and grief knowing that their lives have been changed and affected for ever."

Ipswich Crown Court was told that Jeffrey Hawker had been celebrating end-of-term exams and apparently fell asleep at the wheel of his parents' Citroen shortly after 6.30pm on June 12 last year. One woman driver was so alarmed at his erratic driving that she followed him for 20 miles flashing her lights. She noticed he was running his hands through his hair and blinking. At one stage he thrust his head and shoulders out of his side window.

Hawker's car veered across the road on the A140 in Thwaite, Suffolk, causing another driver to swerve, before running head-on into the Datsun of 44-year-old Patricia Johnson, and her husband, Michael, of Dereham, Norfolk. Mrs Johnson, who was asleep in the passenger seat, died; her husband was injured.

Patricia Johnson: died in head-on crash

Hawker eventually returned to his students' residence in Norwich, and the next morning went home to Bexleyheath, Kent, where the plot was hatched to conceal his involvement.

Eight days later Hawker had a row with his father and gave himself up to police.

The family moved to their £80,000 semi-detached house in Bexleyheath five years ago. Jeffrey Hawker passed his driving test when he was 17 and had one endorsement for

Ministers demand aid for homebuyers

BY PHILIP WEBSTER, POLITICAL EDITOR

KENNETH CLARKE is coming under pressure from senior Cabinet colleagues to kickstart the housing market, including cutting interest rates if possible.

In spite of consistent signals from the Treasury and Downing Street that short-term special measures are virtually ruled out, a number of influential ministers believe that something must be done for homebuyers if the Government is to have any chance of re-election. They also insist that any action must be taken this year if it is to work through in time for a poll that could come as early as next autumn.

"The next three weeks will decide the fate of this Government," a senior Cabinet minister told The Times this week, who hoped that the Chancellor would cut interest rates at Budget time and rethink his opposition to measures to tackle negative equity.

He and other ministers believe that the Tories' position has become so perilous — opinion polls put them 39.5 points behind Labour — that Treasury orthodoxy must not obstruct political necessity.

The least they want is a firm pledge that there will be no further cuts in mortgage interest tax relief, which has been reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent in successive Budgets. Some even want the trend reversed, raising relief to 25 per cent for £50,000 of a first-time buyer's mortgage.

Yesterday's inflation prediction from the Bank of England provided little real cheer for those pressing for interest rate

'Human shields' win £3m for BA's Kuwait stopover

BY BEN MACINTYRE AND HARVEY ELLIOTT

BRITISH AIRWAYS was ordered yesterday to pay more than £3 million in damages to 61 passengers taken hostage by Saddam Hussein's troops when their flight landed in Kuwait hours after the Iraqi invasion in 1990.

A court in Paris ruled that BA had "gravely failed in its obligations" to the passengers in not foreseeing the danger, and should pay them between £52,000 and £78,000 each. The French claimants, who alleged that the aircraft had landed in Kuwait to drop off 15 undercover SAS commandos, had sought £5.8 million.

BA said that an appeal would be lodged today against "this astonishing decision". It also said that no military personnel were on board, and denied knowing about the invasion until after the Boeing 747 had landed. Similar cases brought in England and Scotland have failed, as have appeals. A further appeal to the House of Lords is likely to be heard early next year.

BA flight 149, carrying 349 passengers and 18 crew, was en route to Madras and Kuala Lumpur via Kuwait when it was seized by Iraqi troops. The French passengers claimed that it had made an "unscheduled" stop at Kuwait after being delayed, but BA insisted last night that it had always intended to land there.

Many of the passengers were taken to Baghdad, while others were used as "human shields" to prevent bombing of strategic targets, and held for up to three months.

John Chappell, from Stafford, who is pursuing a claim in Britain after being held while returning to his job with GEC-Marconi in India with his wife and two children, said last night: "This is very good news. We have all suffered and now maybe the truth will come out."

The Paris court yesterday placed "full responsibility on the airline" for the capture of its passengers and ruled that the large sums to be paid in compensation were justified by the "horrors of detention under extremely perilous conditions, sometimes accompanied by physical and psychological cruelty".

Giving judgment, Pierre Renard-Peyen said that the hypothesis of SAS involvement could not be proven, but he criticised BA, saying that while the Iraqi invasion might have been "unstoppable", it was not "unforeseeable".

British scientists close to freezing human eggs

BY NIGEL HAWKES
SCIENCE EDITOR

BRITISH scientists believe they are close to successfully freezing human eggs, which would allow career women to postpone having babies until their forties or even later. Professor Martin Johnson, of the Department of Anatomy at Cambridge, says the technique has been perfected for mouse eggs, but he declines to predict how long it will be before women are able to set up a store of their own frozen eggs. "We could say a year, we could say three — it all depends on how well things go," he said.

The freezing of sperm and embryos has been possible for some ten years, but eggs are a more difficult proposition. Two years ago, an Australian team claimed a breakthrough, but there have been no reports of their technique being successfully applied.

Professor Johnson, who has been working on the project for five years with Professor Peter Broude, of St Thomas' Hospital in London, believes there would be many advantages in freezing eggs. Apart from those pursuing a career, he said, "there are women who have an early menopause, or who have radiotherapy for cancer which destroys their eggs."

The problem is that freezing eggs damages them. To avoid this, "anti-freeze" solutions are used, but they, too, can inflict damage. The Cambridge team has used dimethyl sulphoxide and has found that the most difficult steps have been adding it before freezing and removing it after thawing without damaging the egg. This problem has been overcome, however, and when human eggs have been frozen and thawed they appear "very close to normal". Professor Johnson said.

With mice, the process now works well. "We can freeze them, thaw them, fertilise them and put them back, and normal baby mice are born," he said.

A session of mists and numbing dullness

MATTHEW PARRIS
POLITICAL SKETCH

ON A MISTY London autumn day, Parliament was prorogued yesterday amid the customary flummery performed in a near-empty chamber to a smattering of baffled tourists. Few know why the session ends now. Few care to inquire.

I cannot remember when the place had a scratchier, more distracted feel. MPs know they are sinking to new depths in public esteem and are not confident that their decision this week to disclose fees will bring the decline to a halt.

It has been plain from frontbench questions and backbench heckles that the Opposition see Monday's resolution as the beginning, not the end, of a long war of attrition on Tory Members' interests. Careless how they risk bringing their whole House, rather than just the Tores, into disrepute, they relish the discomfiture of the Conservative Party: a great hot-air balloon, leaking in all directions and dipping ever closer to the waves as its panicking passengers jettison directorships, consultancies, mistresses, Cup-Final tickets ... anything, to delay the aproaching dunking.

Tory depression this week is easy to explain. More mysterious is the continuing benightedness of the principal Opposition. Tony Blair, who has led them to a record lead in the opinion polls and fresh from a great speech to his party conference, is greeted twice weekly, as he strides in for Prime Minister's Questions, with a cheer so low as to be almost sullen. Attendance has been thin for a party riding a wave of public support and heading for victory. Questions to ministers from Labour sound, too often, ill-coached and unconvinced. One bad speech from Jack Straw on the prison crisis left his party dismayed and reeling.

Why so downhearted? Your sketchwriter remembers the cruellest days for Labour in the early 1980s when, with Michael Foot as their leader, it was impossible to believe they could win and possible to doubt whether they would survive as a mainstream political party. Yet they were in better heart then than now.

I used to sit opposite them, on the Tory benches. Mrs Thatcher looked unstoppable, yet the Opposition would roar their outrage at her Government with a moral confidence and sincerity that — though miles higher in the polls — they cannot match today.

They knew she could beat them but they were damned if they were going to join her: as with some doomed prophet, fatalism and self-belief marched hand in hand. Echoing the Gospels they might have cried: "It needs must be that offences come, but woe unto those men through whom they come!" Now they are those men, or expect to be.

The Commons just risen had developed the air of a long-stay, low-security mental asylum. Here, someone would be shouting at a tree; there, another would be weeping quietly alone on a bench; a third would be stumbling through the marigolds mumbling to herself; while a handful more would be jabbing fingers at each other in inane dispute. Sitting in my seat above the chamber last week, just after a ministerial statement, a man's voice was suddenly raised in a string of shouted obscenities, "you f— hypocrites, you're all ..."

"Routine stuff," I thought, "but they're warming up. I wonder if the Chair heard".

Then I saw a terrific struggle in the Strangers' Gallery, as a mad interrupter was dragged by attendants from his seat. Down in the chamber MPs stared up in shock. Had it been one of their own number they wouldn't have paused from their Christmas card lists.

'A political propagandist was needed and that is not my style'

Tories' spin doctor walks out after six months in post

BY PHILIP WEBSTER, POLITICAL EDITOR

THE Conservative Party's pre-election planning was thrown into turmoil yesterday after its director of communications resigned after only six months in the job.

Hugh Colver, 50, went after telling Brian Mawhinney, the party chairman, in a letter that he had decided his talents were not best-suited to handling the run-up to the general election.

He appears to have become the latest victim of the successes of Labour's public relations team. At the Conservative conference last month senior ministers were openly envious of Labour's PR coups the previous week and questioning whether they had a team that could rival it.

There was considerable private sniping at Mr Colver, a former chief press officer at the Ministry of Defence and director of communications at British Aerospace, and his position was undermined when a team of senior MPs was appointed to brief lobby correspondents during the conference.

Mr Colver, who was appointed during the brief and unsuccessful reign of Jeremy Hanley as Tory chairman, had been growing increasingly unhappy in the job although the timing of his departure took Central Office by surprise. Tim Collins, a former communications director, and the prospective candidate for Westmorland and Lonsdale, will resume the helm temporarily. An urgent search began immediately for a senior figure to head the PR effort.

The party announced other changes in the press office, including the appointment of three journalists to beef up the operation. They include Sheila Gunn, a former political correspondent of The Times. Mr Colver had been closely involved in the negotiations over their arrival.

Mr Mawhinney said last night that he regretted Mr Colver's decision. "In his letter to me today, he told me that on his appointment he had decided to consider his position at the end of six months. On reflection, he clearly feels his talents, considerable though they are, are not best suited for handling the run-up to the general election. I disagree, and I told him that was my view, but he made his decision and I respect it."

A Tory insider said that Mr Colver genuinely felt he did not have the necessary "spin doctor" talents required. "He did not feel comfortable. He clearly felt he was not the right man for the job. We are sorry."

But another spoke of a clash of personalities between Mr Colver and Mr Mawhinney. "Hugh was not pushed. He had had enough. Hugh had been under tremendous pressure and was not happy. You only had to look at him to see that."

Another said: "Central Office is a vipers' nest. The plotting goes on daily. Hugh did not like it and he is well out of it."

Mr Colver last night argued that the main reason he had left was that Central Office needed a "political propagandist" and he did not fit the bill. He also admitted that he "did not click" with the team now in place.

In his letter of resignation Mr Colver pointed out that he had arrived under an entirely different team six months ago with John Maples and Michael Dobbs. "I was under the impression that this was a communications job," Mr Colver said. "But with the new team it became apparent that a political propagandist was needed and that is not my style." He said that instead he was involved in Labour bashing and party politicking which he quickly tired of.

He also admitted that he "did not click" with the new chairman, Mr Mawhinney, and the deputy chairman, Michael Trend. While he had no personal animosity against either man he did not feel he fitted in. "I didn't quite fit the hole."

Labour relished the news. "Hugh Colver is suffering from the fact that the Tory party is now almost impossible to sell to the wider world," a spokesman said.

"They clearly have serious problems if they have to ask Tim Collins to come back again as he is a parliamentary candidate and therefore cannot give them full-time attention."

Among the other appointments Ceri Evans, 34, a BBC TV producer, becomes chief broadcasting officer, responsible for relations with broadcasters, and Paul Hooper, who spent 11 years with The Sun, will boost the press relations operation.

Cases of CJD are expected to decline

BY GILLIAN BOWDITCH

THE incidence of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, the degenerative fatal brain condition which some scientists believe is linked to mad cow disease, looks set to fall when the figures for 1995 are revealed. But the next few years will be crucial in determining whether the two diseases are linked, the leading expert in the field said yesterday.

The incidence of CJD had doubled between 1985 and 1994, but Dr Robert Will, the consultant neurologist in charge of a Government-funded project scrutinising all CJD cases, said the number of referrals so far this year was down by more than 40 per cent on last year.

There have been 65 referrals this year and only half are likely to prove positive. Last year Dr Will and his team at the CJD Surveillance Unit at Edinburgh's Western General Hospital had 115 referrals from clinicians. There were 55 deaths from CJD in 1994, the highest recorded in any year since surveillance began.

Dr Will confirmed yesterday that the figure for 1995 looks set to be substantially lower than 1994, although the final figure is not due to be published until mid-1996. "It looks very much as if there will be fewer cases, which is reassuring."

Dr Will said that despite extensive studies, he still has no evidence of a link between CJD and BSE.

Lilley 'filled with despair' over social security cuts

Lilley: says cuts will make system chaotic

BY JILL SHERMAN
POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

PETER LILLEY has delivered a stark warning to the Treasury that its proposals to slash the running costs of his department would have a "devastating impact" and had filled him with "with despair."

In an unusually strongly worded letter from the Social Security Secretary to William Waldegrave, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, Mr Lilley says that the proposed £225 million cuts in administrative costs would make the benefit service "even more chaotic." Chris Smith, Shadow Social Security Secretary, has disclosed a further section from the letter leaked to him on Tuesday night. The initial extract showed that Mr Lilley had agreed to more than £1 billion in cuts from his £89 billion social security budget, including reductions in lone-parent and housing benefit and industrial injury payments but it also revealed that Mr Lilley was fighting further curbs.

Yesterday Labour published the most damaging paragraph of the letter. "Your proposed settlement on running costs fills me with despair. The impact on operations will be devastating," says the letter from Mr Lilley. "Quite apart from the political fallout as the service becomes more chaotic I am convinced ... that we would be cutting off our noses to spite our faces." Mr Waldegrave had been hoping to secure a 5 per cent cut in the running costs of all Whitehall departments as part of an attempt to secure sufficient savings for tax cuts in Budget. The move would wipe a further £225 million from Mr Lilley's £4.5 billion administrative budget.

Mr Smith claimed the letter was more evidence that the Tory party was lurching to the right. "We really have reached a bizarre situation when the Tory party leadership is moving so far to the right that it is even passing by Mr Lilley." Mr Smith said that in its search for tax cuts ministers were planning to attack the most vulnerable groups such as people under 25, lone parents and people who had suffered industrial injuries.

He also claimed that the proposed cuts in running costs would inevitably weaken the battle against fraud. "How can the Government possibly step up the fight against fraud when it is cutting the resources to detect it?" Interviewed on BBC Radio 4, Mr Lilley refused to comment on the letter.

But he said that his priorities were to modernise the social security system, focus the huge £89 billion budget on those in most need, and make sure that the total did not outstrip the nation's ability to pay.

Cuts mean prisoners face longer lock-up

Prisoners in England and Wales may have to spend more time locked in cells because of new cuts in the Prison Service's £1.6 billion annual budget. Senior managers have been told that the Government's public expenditure round has ended in a budget cut of 5 per cent next year, on top of an 8.9 per reduction over the three years to 1998.

A series of emergency measures is under consideration, including cuts in education and a further reduction in the number of jails holding high-risk prisoners. Richard Tilt, Director-General of the Prison Service, said: "The amount of time prisoners spend unlocked may be restricted. We have a target for establishments to unlock for more than twelve hours a day on weekdays. Forty per cent of jails have reached that target. It saves money if we lock up in the evening. We would not need to have so many staff on duty."

£1m water lifeline

Up to six million gallons of water a day will be carried to drought-hit Yorkshire by tanker from Kielder reservoir, Northumberland, under a deal signed between Yorkshire Water and Northumbria Water yesterday. A fleet of 200 tankers will make up to 1,000 journeys a day to carry the untreated water to Ecup reservoir near Leeds at a cost of less than £5 per tanker load to Yorkshire Water. Transport costs are expected to raise the cost of the operation to about £1 million a week.

Home ban on crime boy

A boy aged 14 has been banned from Peterlee, Co Durham, where he is blamed for 10 per cent of the crime. The youth court in his home town varied his bail conditions to exclude him after allegations that he was involved in a £10,000 burglary. He has been put into the care of social services until his case comes before the court and must stay away unless contacting his solicitor or attending a hearing. The boy has appeared before magistrates 72 times since he was 10, but is too young for a young offenders' institution.

Murder pleas rejected

Loyalist terrorists threatened to kill six defendants accused of being involved in the murder of Margaret Wright, 31, in a Belfast drinking den unless they pleaded guilty, the city's Crown Court was told yesterday. The Red Hand Commando issued the death threats on the eve of the trial. Four of the accused, who pleaded not guilty on Tuesday, attempted to plead guilty "under duress" yesterday. Lord Justice Nicholson rejected the new pleas and directed that not guilty pleas be entered. The trial continues.

Bomb suspect in court

An Algerian man will appear before Bow Street magistrates today charged with conspiracy to cause explosions in France. Rachid Ramda, 26, unemployed and of no fixed address, was charged yesterday and held in Paddington Green police station. The court appearance will be the first move by the French to extradite him. Three other Algerians were still being questioned last night under the Prevention of Terrorism Act. Ramda, also identified in France as Abou Fares, was arrested last weekend.

Irish cannabis haul

Irish police and Customs officers discovered 15 tonnes of cannabis worth up to £150 million in a lorry parked in a Kilkenny village yesterday. The drugs found at Urlingford, 70 miles south of Dublin, are the biggest haul made in the republic, which has a growing drug problem. The find was made after a two-week operation that included vessels from the Irish navy. The investigation team is believed to have monitored the landing of the drugs from Morocco and trailed a lorry carrying the container.

West trial delayed

The trial of Rosemary West was adjourned yesterday until Monday after the court was told a witness was still too ill to continue her evidence. Janet Leach, 39, collapsed on Tuesday afternoon at Winchester Crown Court and was taken to a nearby hospital where she is still being treated. Mrs West, 41, denies the murder of 10 young women and girls. Mrs Leach said in her evidence that Frederick West confessed to the killings to police but told her in confidence that he was covering up his wife's involvement.

New advice on cot death

More babies could be saved from cot death if parents put them to bed with their feet touching the cot end, in addition to ensuring that they sleep on their backs, experts said yesterday. The Foundation for the Study of Infant Deaths said research showed that babies who died of cot death were more likely to get fully covered by the blankets, and that more than a fifth of victims were found with bedding over their heads. Babies who go to sleep with their feet at the cot end are less likely to wriggle down and overheat.

cuts. It suggested that inflation was likely to be a fraction above the Treasury target of 2.5 per cent in two years' time unless rates were raised. However, the quarterly inflation report also said the likelihood of hitting the target had increased since August because growth had slowed.

Michael Heseltine, the Deputy Prime Minister, is understood to be among those who have been arguing behind the scenes for action to convince traditional Tory supporters that the Government has their interests at heart. The message is also understood to have been passed on when Mr Clarke met a group of ministerial aides on Monday. Those present say there were several calls to help homeowners.

The Prime Minister and Mr Clarke have maintained throughout the summer that low interest rates are the best remedy for negative equity, but some ministers believe that something should be done to try to raise the morale of the homeowner — and that specially targeted measures are preferable to across-the-board cuts in income tax.

What sort of father gives a son that sort of advice? Even when they knew my wife had been killed ... they stuck to their lies. If the son had not had an attack of conscience eight days later no one would have been any the wiser."

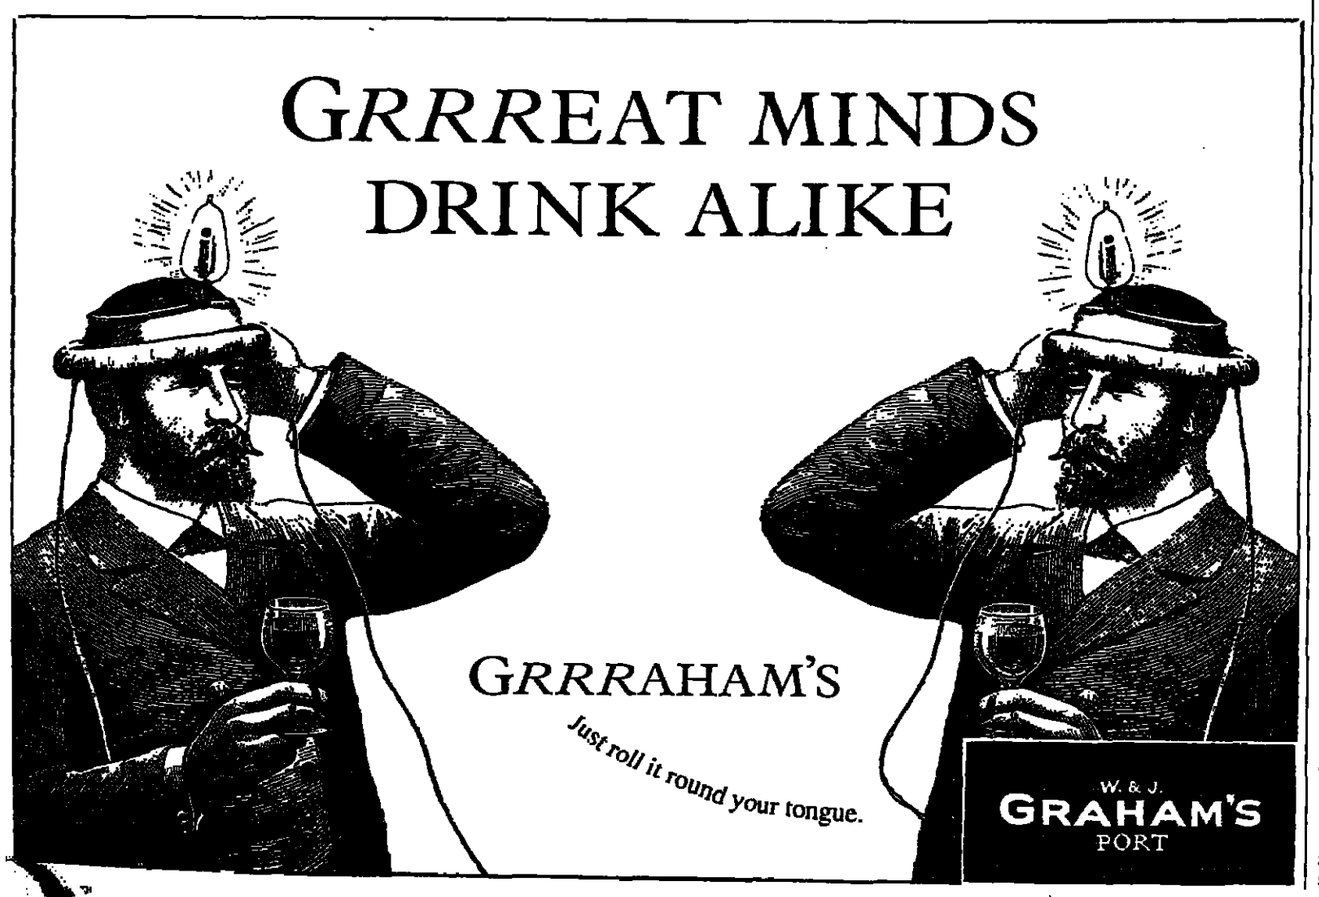

The Johnsons were returning from a hospital visit when the crash happened. "All I can remember ... is looking down at my wife and seeing her sleeping peacefully in the passenger seat. I knew I was going to crash. I remember thinking: thank God she's asleep."

Mr Johnson has been told that he will receive £7,500 compensation for his wife's life. He is pursuing a civil claim for damages. "Whatever happens now won't bring my wife back."

Elsie Bell, 75, the dead woman's mother, directed her anger at the former stockbroker. "I wanted to come face to face with him. He has torn a family apart. I will never ever get over this." Her husband, Ernest, 76, from Ipswich, Suffolk, said: "That boy's parents should have got more than they did. They knew what they were doing when they tried to cover up."

Pritchett: "justice has been done"

THE owner of a Kent vineyard who shot two burglars was cleared of deliberate wounding yesterday. Jon Pritchett went free with the backing of one of the men he wounded.

Mr Pritchett, 60, chairman of his local Neighbourhood Watch group, had said that he never intended to harm the men when he opened fired in the dark with a double-barrelled shotgun.

One of the burglars, Charles O'Hara, 36, of Borough Green, Kent, had refused to attend the trial at Maidstone Crown Court as a witness, because he did not feel the prosecution should have been brought. He said: "We knew what we were doing that night. We were on his property stealing his stuff. He should not have been prosecuted."

O'Hara, who was the subject of an arrest warrant after failing to give evidence, received superficial gunshot injuries to his chest, arm and head, but declined hospital treatment at the time.

He had been put on two years' probation for breaking into the bonded warehouse on the 6½-acre vineyard at St Mary's Platt, in December.

The second man, Stephen Gilbert, 31 of Yalding, also received two years' probation. Both had criminal records. Gilbert, who had convictions for violence and burglary, disagreed with his accomplice. "You don't shoot just because they are burglars. If people were allowed to shoot people we would all be wearing guns."

Mr Pritchett, who developed a stammer because of the trauma of the incident, is unemployed after losing his job as an insurance loss adjuster. The charge of wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm carries a maximum sentence of life. After the verdict, he said: "I am relieved that justice has been done. The prosecution should never have taken place in the first place."

The court had been told that Mr Pritchett was severely shaken and remorseful after hitting the two men. The warehouse contained wine worth £12,000 and had previously been a target for other burglars.

Mr Pritchett had been awoken by the alarm sounding in his house. He had not called the police, but pulled his clothes over his pyjamas, taking a gun which he had left in the bedroom after shooting magpies that day, and went to investigate.

He stood in the driveway and heard voices. Then, terrified and unaware if the men were armed, he fired at the warehouse door and into the air, hitting Gilbert as he fled and O'Hara as he came up through a hole in the roof.

He said he fired his four shots blindly. He did not see the burglars until O'Hara came out of the warehouse. "As I pulled the trigger, a figure popped up on to the roof," he said.

At the end of the three-day trial, Mr Justice Newman said: "For those of us who have heard the details of this case, and for those who might take or misunderstand the result of this case, I think one thing is plain. The events of that particular night caused you great trauma. It caused you such trauma that you suffered a speech impediment for some time. The general lesson that still rests in this case is the serious consequences of what you did on that night and the severe consequence on you."

Mr Pritchett, who has two adult sons, left to go home to his wife Margaret.

His solicitor, Ted Hubbard, said: "She is the one who has paid the price with the tension and sheer worry of it all. She was there that night and heard the shots."

Donna Hayes said the driver put her into his boot because he thought she had died

Crash victim bundled into boot by driver

BY ROBIN YOUNG

A WOMAN knocked unconscious by a car told yesterday how she was bundled into the boot by the driver because he thought she was dead.

Donna Hayes, 33, of Wangford, Suffolk, was hit by a car and knocked out as she walked from home to the Cherry Tree Inn at Stoven, where she is a waitress. She said yesterday: "I crossed the A12 and was walking along watching the sheep graze and the next thing I woke up in the boot of a car."

Mrs Hayes, a mother of three, thumped on the boot lid until the driver stopped and opened it about two miles further on. She said he told her: "Sorry, I thought I had killed you, so I put you in there."

Mrs Hayes said the driver let her sit in the front seat and offered to drive her to a doctor. She did not panic or feel any pain at the time because she was in shock.

The driver seemed amazed to see her alive, Mrs Hayes said. "He was as much in panic and shock as I was. The windscreen was shattered, and I asked him if I had done that. He replied, 'Yes.'"

She asked him to drive her to the house of a friend, Sarah Fairhead, and waited in the car while he went inside. Mrs Fairhead, 27, said: "A man came into my kitchen and said he thought he had killed a woman and had put her in the boot. I rushed outside and saw Donna unconscious in the passenger seat. She started to come round again so I made her stay there and telephoned the police, who called an ambulance."

Mrs Hayes suffered concussion, a broken shoulder and bruising to her legs in the incident on October 5 and spent 24 hours in the James Paget Hospital at Gorleston, near Great Yarmouth, Norfolk. She has no recollection of being hit, and said that when she regained consciousness in the boot she thought she had been the victim of a practical joke.

"I did not feel any pain because I was still in shock. I was dazed and felt as if I was dreaming. I remember knocking on the boot but I cannot recall how many times I had to do it before the car stopped," Mrs Hayes said.

Her wounds have now healed but she is receiving physiotherapy and trauma counselling. Her husband Russell, 36, a plastics worker, said yesterday: "Donna just cannot seem to get it out of her mind."

One of Mrs Hayes's shoes was recovered by police from a field near the scene but a shoulder bag containing her watch, wedding and signet rings has not been found.

A 28-year-old man who was arrested and released on police bail is due to return to Halesworth police station today.

All you need is a lucrative Beatles publishing deal

BY JOE JOSEPH

Jackson: will pocket about £60 million

JUST days after the three surviving Beatles condemned Michael Jackson for "cheapening their hits by letting them be used in advertising, Jackson has sold the music publishing rights to 251 Beatles songs to Sony, his own record label.

Jackson will pocket about £60 million from the sale. He secured the rights to the Beatles treasury in 1985 for about £32 million, outbidding McCartney. His new deal with Sony, sealed late on Tuesday in New York, means that, while the Beatles will continue to reap royalties, their chances of regaining control of their hits have diminished further.

"Tragically, that may well be the result," Amanda Harcourt, general-secretary of the British Academy of Songwriters, Composers and Authors, said. "I say tragically, because we're talking about Britain's musical heritage here. What happens to these songs will be driven by what happens in America and Japan."

The deal creates a joint-venture publishing giant, valued at about £330 million, marrying Sony's music publishing division with Jackson's ATV Music Catalog, a 4,000-song trove which includes numbers sung by Elvis Presley and Little Richard as well as hits recorded by the Beatles from 1964 to 1970, when the group disbanded.

Paul McCartney, who thinks Jackson has "cheapened" Beatles songs by allowing them to be used in television commercials — Revolution was used to sell Nike training shoes — yesterday had nothing to say about the deal with Sony, which already owns the rights to songs by Bob Dylan, Bruce Springsteen and Leonard Cohen. Silence, too, from George Harrison, who said this week: "Unless we do something about it, every Beatles song is going to end up advertising bras and pork pies." Jackson, though, regards himself as a custodian of the Lennon-McCartney heritage, and recently blocked a rap album of Beatles songs.

Music publishing is one of the most lucrative areas in the music industry and involves the exploitation of song copyrights. A copyright owner receives royalties each time a song is broadcast or performed. Fees also flow in if the song is recorded or licensed, say, for a commercial. McCartney, as with any songwriter, pockets songwriting royalties even if he doesn't own copyrights.

McCartney is said to be particularly peeved that Jackson refuses even to increase his royalties — despite talk that Yoko Ono has renegotiated the share due to her late husband, John Lennon. Even more gallingly, it is disclosed in McCartney: Yesterday And Today by Ray Coleman that it was McCartney himself who drew Jackson's attention to the money to be made from publishing.

Challenge to police on shot farmer

BY STEWART TENDLER

POLICE marksmen opened fire on an armed farmer within two minutes of the head of the Devon and Cornwall police firearms unit arriving on the scene, the High Court was told yesterday.

The usual police practice in such situations of "containment followed by negotiation" did not apparently happen.

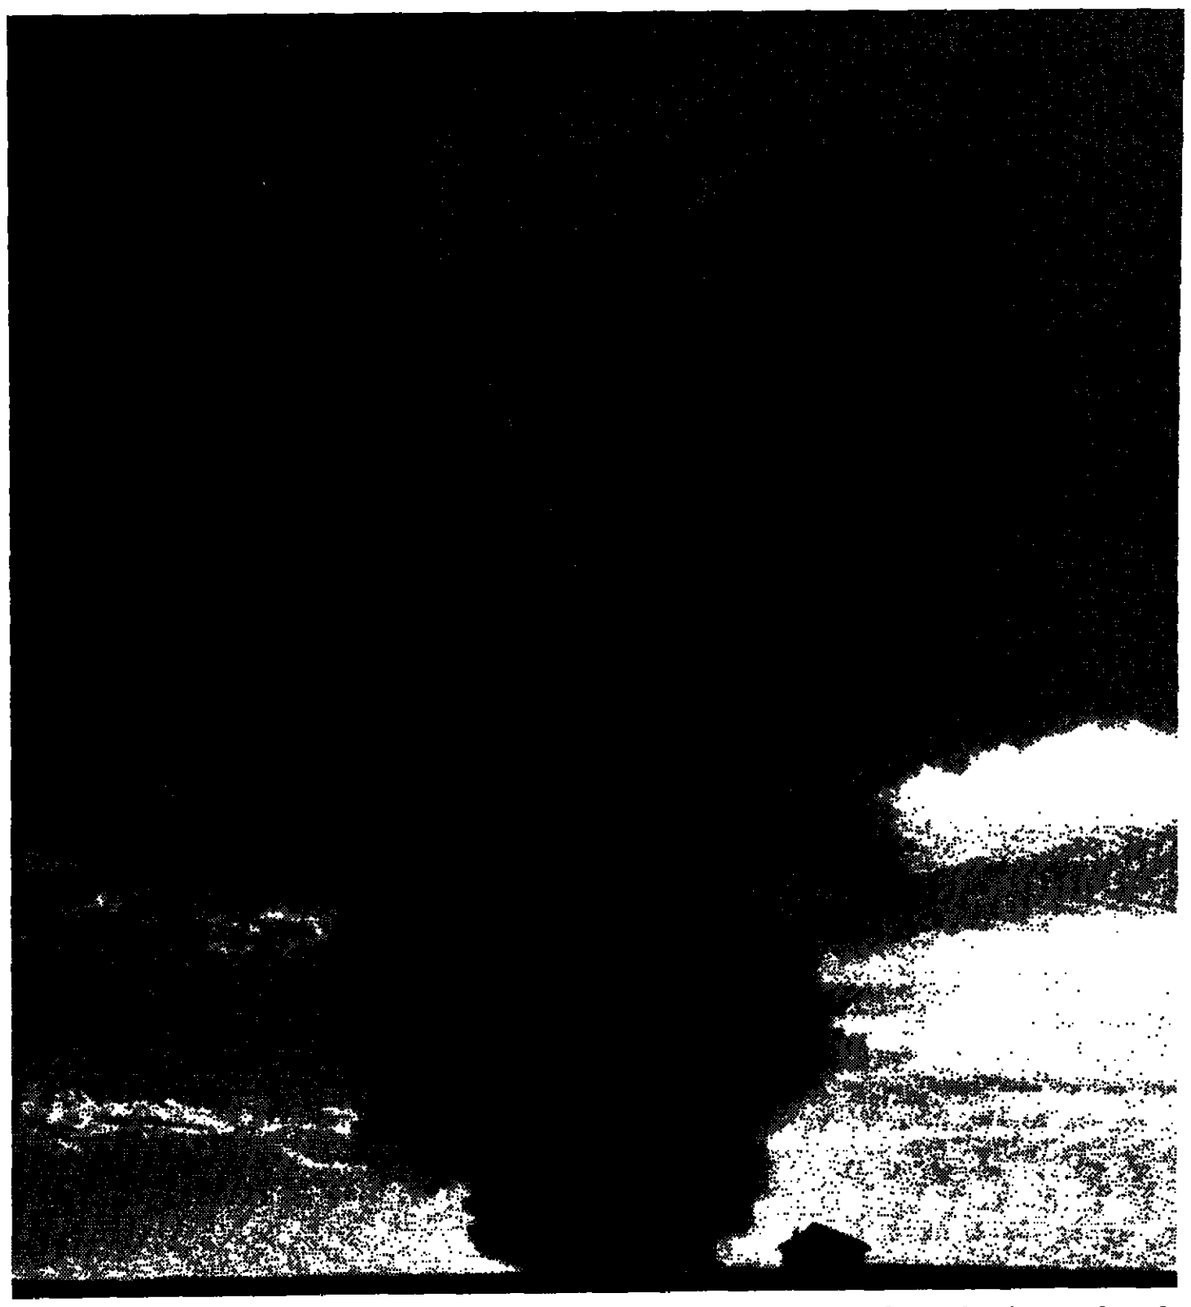

Details of the case were given as the Police Complaints Authority and the family of Ian Fitzgerald Hay, 39, who was shot and killed at his home near Totnes, Devon, in October 1993, applied for leave to seek judicial review of decisions stemming from the incident.

The first challenge was to the decision not to record a complaint made against officers involved; the second decision was to allow the officer sent to command the operation to resign from the force "and thus avoid facing disciplinary proceedings"; the third was to dismiss a charge of neglect of duty brought against the head of Devon and Cornwall's firearms unit.

The hearing continues on Monday.

Expert committees call for tough emission laws after warning Government there is no safe limit

Diesel fumes 'are killing thousands of people a year'

AIR POLICY

TOUGH limits for diesel fumes were urged last night by government scientists after they published reports showing diesel pollution is killing thousands of people each year.

Lives would be saved if levels of airborne particulates, tiny flecks of soot and metals produced largely by traffic emissions, were cut, two expert committees concluded after studying data from around the world.

The Government said it would consider "as quickly as possible" whether to adopt the committees' recommended limits within the new Air Quality Strategy now being prepared under the Environment Act. If adopted, the limits would be the most rigorous in the world.

The scientists accepted previous American and European studies of the health risks of diesel, which found powerful evidence that rising particulate levels in the air increased the risk of ill-health and premature death for people with heart conditions and breathing difficulties.

The committees believe the number of deaths attributable to particulate emissions may range from 2,000 to 10,000 a year. Professor Anthony Seaton, chairman of the Expert Panel on Air Quality, said it was impossible to say whether patients were seeing their lives reduced "by a day, a year or years". He said the evidence was that, even at quite low levels, particles can cause damage in vulnerable groups, indicating there is no safe limit. Pollution levels exceed what he called a realistic level of 50 micrograms per cubic metre on about 36 days of the year in Britain, with levels sometimes approaching 200 micrograms. Dr Kenneth Calman, the Chief Medical Officer, described the recommended limit as "challenging ... but proof we are taking this seriously".

He said Britain would be only the second country in the world to set a particulate standard and that the 50mcg figure would be the toughest. Ministers accepted the findings and promised to reduce diesel fumes as part of the Government's overall strategy to clean up the air by 2005.

But clean air campaigners said they feared it would fail to meet the proposed limit by then. Tim Brown of the National Society for Clean Air said last night: "The lesson from the United States is that ever-tightening emissions standards and new technologies do not work unless they are backed up with proper policing and fines."

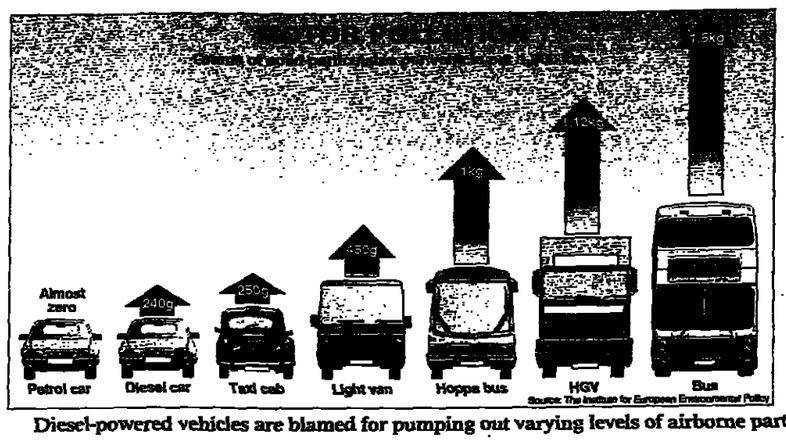

Professor Stephen Holgate of Southampton University, chairman of the Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants, said yesterday that the masks used by cyclists to protect them from fumes were useless against particulates.

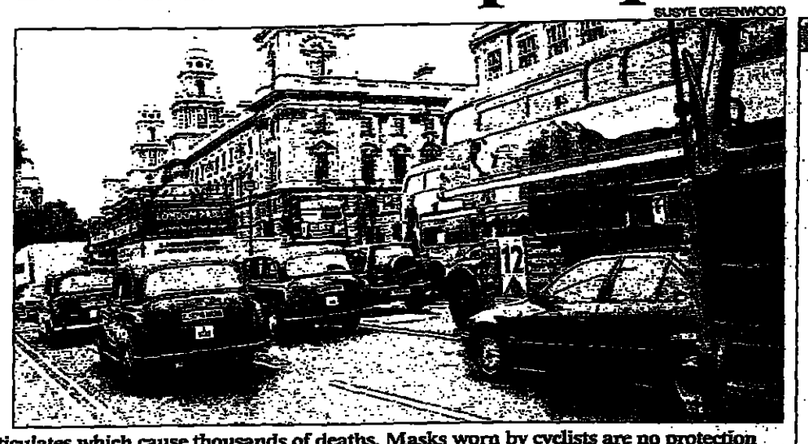

The committees also indicated that the smaller the particulates the more damaging they are to the lungs and the heart. Professor Holgate said they seemed to trigger inflammation of the lungs.

The Freight Transport Association urged the Government to give lorry operators cash incentives to switch to new, less polluting, vehicles. Roger Higman, of Friends of the Earth, said it was now accepted that thousands of people were being killed each year yet the Government's response was to work towards the proposed standard.

Joan Ruddock, Labour's environmental protection spokeswoman, said that to reduce pollution the country needed an integrated transport system offering people genuine choices.

Diesel-powered vehicles are blamed for pumping out varying levels of airborne particulates which cause thousands of deaths. Masks worn by cyclists are no protection

OWNERSHIP of diesel cars has soared in the past decade. Last year, 23 per cent of new private-car registrations were diesel fuelled, compared with 4 per cent in 1986. There are about 101,000 diesel buses and coaches, making up the bulk of the British fleet, largely because of lower fuel costs. Diesel double-decker buses are among the dirtiest vehicles on the roads. There are about 400,000 diesel lorries in service. About one in ten "dirty" lorries is thought to be responsible for 90 per cent of lorry particulate emissions. Most of the British Rail train fleet is powered by diesel, although older dirty models are being replaced. But InterCity locomotives emit 25 per cent more particulates per passenger than diesel cars. "Train spotters should be careful," warned Malcolm Fergusson, senior fellow at the Institute for European Environment Policy.

Ministries issue pledge to reduce deadly particles

REACTION

THE Government pledged to reduce diesel fumes and outlined its strategy to cut hazardous particles after yesterday's report recommending tough targets to safeguard public health.

Whitehall officials said they were backing European moves, including tighter emission standards for diesel lorries, vans and cars, which are being phased in during the next two years. These are expected to halve all transport fumes by 2005.

But the Departments of Health, Environment and Transport admitted in a joint statement that far more action was needed to meet the new recommended limit for particles of 50 micrograms per cubic metre.

Measures include:

☐ Traffic restrictions. Plans would give local councils powers to close streets and restrict the speed, size and type of vehicles in pollution blackspots. The Government has signalled that it will look favourably on plans that restrict heavy goods vehicles and diesel vans.

☐ Promoting alternative diesel fuels. Ministers are to publish all government and industrial research on cleaner fuels to boost their uptake by motorists and industry.

☐ Promoting anti-pollution technologies. Ministers announced yesterday that they were carrying out tests with new technologies, such as particle traps, a cleaning device bolted on to exhausts, which may sharply reduce particle emissions.

☐ Extending anti-pollution powers. The Government reaffirmed its commitment to give councils and officials power to crack down on dirty vehicles in cities through spot checks and fines.

☐ Increasing duty on diesel and lowering duty on natural gas. Yesterday's statement hints that the Chancellor will dramatically boost the fuel duty on diesel and at least freeze the duty on natural gas as a road fuel in the Budget on November 28.

☐ Boosting tighter Euro-standards. The Government has promised to push for even tougher vehicle emission and diesel fuel standards beyond 2000 across Europe.

☐ Other sources of particles. Limits on pollution from incinerators and factories will be tightened every four years. The Government also announced it was commissioning studies into cutting particle emissions from quarries and mines, and plans for a code of conduct for the construction industry.

☐ Power stations. The Government said it would continue to encourage gas-fired power generation, which produces fewer particles.

The Government is keen to see businesses encourage greener travel by employees. Ideas put forward by councils include giving workers bus passes, offering coach services on days when pollution is high and encouraging cycling through secure cycle parking facilities and grants to buy bicycles.

Other schemes that may be backed include shutting industries and power stations on days when the wind direction, weather conditions and pollution levels are forecast to be high.

Unsightly smoke obscures danger

DIESEL v PETROL

FIVE years ago diesel engines were extolled as a cleaner alternative to petrol. As recently as 1992, the Treasury introduced inducements in the Budget to encourage the use of diesel fuel. Today it is being attacked as a serious threat to health. What has changed?

Diesels emit less than a third as many unburnt hydrocarbons as a petrol engine, 1 per cent of the carbon monoxide, and a third of the carbon dioxide. They are considerably more economical, especially in stop-start motoring.

But petrol engines have become cleaner in recent years with the help of catalysts, while health concerns have shifted from lead in the atmosphere.

Evidence collected over the past five years has implicated another component of exhausts, particulates, as the real source of danger. Old diesel engines on buses, trucks or taxis have always produced black, smoky particles, but smoke that you can see is not the whole problem.

The newer diesels produce finer particles that look less alarming but are believed to do more damage. Petrol engines also generate particulates, but only about a third as many as diesels. A petrol engine fitted with a catalytic converter is even better, by a factor of two.

Diesel vehicles are believed to be responsible for two thirds of all particulates emitted. The smaller particles, known as PM10, are able to enter the finest airways in the lungs, carrying with them other irritants. Their name refers to their having a diameter of less than ten micrometres or one hundredth of a millimetre.

"Green" versions of diesel produce less PM10 and are available already at some filling stations. These fuels have lower levels of sulphur and are formulated differently, but cost more, which has discouraged some oil companies from making them. But Sainsbury's, which sells City Diesel at some sites, has found that the public is more than willing to pay an extra 2p a litre for it.

Chauffeur was driving me to distraction, says union boss

Janjua: claiming race discrimination

A UNION leader was forced to become a backseat driver because his chauffeur did not know his routes properly, an industrial tribunal was told yesterday. John Edmonds, general secretary of the GMB, said he became fed up with his timetable being "screwed up" by journeys that took longer than necessary.

His former chauffeur, Tahir Raffi Janjua, 38, of Norbury, south London, is claiming unfair dismissal on the grounds of racial discrimination.

Mr Edmonds told the tribunal at Croydon, south London: "We would take a quarter of an hour or 20 minutes more than was normal from the union's headquarters in Wimbledon to central London. It was screwing up a large part of my days. I was getting pretty fed up.

"I commented on many occasions that he did not have to go through Clapham from Wimbledon to central London. In the first few months of his employment, I must have told him this a dozen times. I need to use the time in the car as work time. The last thing I wanted to be was a backseat driver."

Mr Edmonds added that his wife had complained that Mr Janjua's driving made her car sick. He said Mr Janjua had tried to justify late arrivals at engagements because of heavy traffic and roadworks.

Mr Edmonds said the chauffeur had written him a letter which stated he was not prepared to work certain hours without extra pay. Gerry German, representing Mr Janjua, asked if it would not have been possible to alter the working hours. The union leader replied: "I can't make an ad-hoc change for one individual. Mr Janjua was clearly not accepting the conditions which were spelt out to him when he was employed."

The chauffeur drove him from February 1993 to March 1994. Mr Edmonds said there had been no reference to racial harassment by Mr Janjua in any of the disciplinary hearings and appeals that led to his dismissal. He described Mr Janjua's claim as "frivolous".

Mr Edmonds said the driver was quiet and courteous until he was told to do something that he did not want to do. His main test point on whether something was fair, Mr Edmonds said, was to compare it with his previous job as a chauffeur with UCATT. If it was not something he had done at the construction union, he thought it unfair and unreasonable.

On one occasion, Mr Edmonds said, he had to struggle with baggage in one hand and an umbrella in the pouring rain because Mr Janjua did not open the car door for him.

Mr Edmonds said the chauffeur had told him that a number of unions had better and newer cars than the Ford Granada he drove. "I pointed out to him that the basic Granada could do 100,000 miles and then we would renew it. He said that would take many years and it was not good to keep a car that long." Mr Janjua then tried to persuade the union leader's personal assistant to try to talk him into getting a new car, Mr Edmonds said.

The hearing continues.

Rushdie pipped in final hour

Judges surprised themselves with Booker decision

By Andrew Pierce

SALMAN RUSHDIE's failure to become the first novelist to win the Booker Prize for the second time surprised even the judges, it emerged yesterday.

The five adjudicators arrived for their final meeting apparently convinced he would win, but in the last hour of argument the tide turned in favour of Pat Barker, 52, who was the unexpected choice for the £20,000 prize.

Word spread to the waiting literati at Guildhall, London, on Tuesday night that it was a straight fight between Barker and Rushdie. By the end of the secret session only George Walden, MP, the chairman of the judges' panel, was championing Rushdie's The Moor's Last Sigh.

The crime writer Ruth Rendell was one of the last of the five judges to come down in favour of Barker. Peter Kemp, critic on The Sunday Times, was an implacable opponent of Rushdie from the outset. The critic Adam Mars-Jones was less decided, while feeling that Barker's The Ghost Road was outstanding. Kate Kellaway, the poetry editor on The Observer, had initially spoken up for one other shortlisted title, Tim Winton's The Riders. One of the panellists said: "When we went in we all thought Rushdie would win. But it became clear it was wide open after everyone had spoken. After an hour Pat Barker's name emerged from the middle, leaving Rushdie trailing."

Mr Walden, asked if the best book had won, replied diplomatically: "The committee's choice won."

Winton was the only other viable shortlisted candidate. Barry Unsworth, author of Morality Play, and Justin Cartwright's In Every Face I Meet were not in contention.

Peter Kemp was the most decisive influence against Rushdie. Having written a hostile review of the book he helped to sway the other judges with a detailed critique of the last 50 pages.

Pat Barker, who expected Rushdie to win, nevertheless had wagered a small bet on herself. Rushdie also thought he had won, according to his friends, but he consoled himself at a party in Soho on Tuesday night. "While the Booker Prize will help Pat Barker sell 50,000 copies he drowned his sorrows safe in the knowledge that he has already sold 150,000," a friend said. Carmen Callil, the founder of Virago, who published Barker's first book, Union Street, was delighted. She was introduced to Barker by the late Angela Carter, who had met Barker at a writing workshop in West Yorkshire. She was bringing up two children at home and working as a supply teacher at the time.

Ms Callil said: "Angela Carter showed me Union Street. I thought it was wonderful. There was something about the book which I had not seen in any new writer I had published at the time. She writes with an extraordinarily fictional voice."

Barker, who lives in a semi-detached house just outside Durham City, 250 miles from London's literary set, attended a girls' grammar school so strict that no girl was allowed to talk to a boy even if he was her brother. Hungry for books, she took out the maximum number from the public library each week and belonged to a ha'penny lending library, starting to write Ruritanian romances at 11. She read international history at LSE, then taught A-level history, politics and English to vocational classes of civil servants, horticulturists, and police cadets.

English-born Peter Phillips scores a try at Murrayfield as he competes for a place in the Scottish Schools squad

Royal Sassenach tries for honours

By Alan Hamilton

THERE will, of course, be absolutely no question of nepotism if, as expected, the English son of the patron of the Scottish Rugby Union gains a coveted place in the Scottish Schools squad tomorrow.

Peter Phillips, 17, impressed selectors at Murrayfield yesterday when he scored a try at a trial match to pick the coming season's junior international squad. He was one of six pupils from Gordonstoun, the stern boarding school in the Grampian region, among 37 young hopefuls bidding for a place in the under-18 side.

The Princess Royal, as patron, is an assiduous attender at Scotland's international games.

Senior figures in Scottish rugby have been impressed by Phillips's performance. Scott Hastings, the international centre and brother of Gavin, the recently retired Scotland and British Lions captain, said after watching yesterday's match at the Edinburgh stadium: "Peter has played very well. The fact that he scored a try sums up his performance."

A panel of five selectors will name their 22-man squad tomorrow for a season of international matches against sides from France, England, Ireland and Wales. Selection is a big step for any aspiring player on the road to the full international squad, although the normal qualifications are to have a parent or grandparent born north of the border, or to have been born there oneself. Peter, the son of Captain Mark Phillips and Princess Anne, both English-born, arrived in the world at St Mary's Hospital, Paddington, London. Bill Hogg, chief executive of the Scottish Rugby Union, said: "There is an exception to every rule."

Disgusted of Kent monitors TV taste

By Alexandra Frean

THE letter-writers of Tunbridge Wells really are more disgusted than the rest of us, according to research by broadcasting watchdogs.

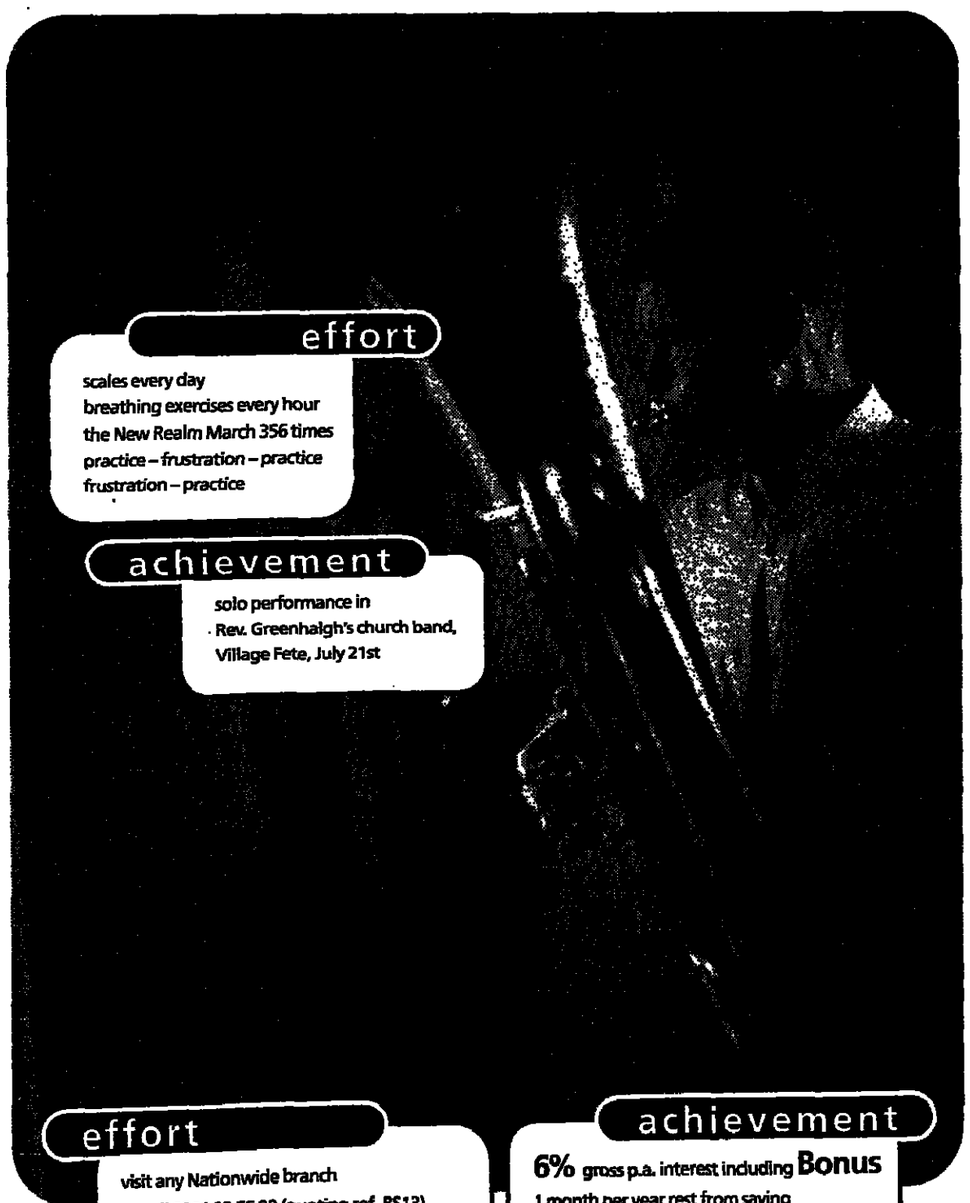

A survey of people who complained to the Broadcasting Standards Council about taste and decency in television and radio programmes found they were more likely to live in Kent than any other area.

Viewers and listeners in Kent (population 1.5 million) sent 97 complaints to the council between July 1993 and December 1994. This was significantly more per head than Greater London (population seven million), which generated 170 complaints. Only 25 complaints were received from Northern Ireland (population 1.6 million).

A total of 2,215 complaints was received during the period. The survey showed they did not come only from a small minority of permanently disgruntled people or pressure groups. Eighty-eight per cent of people who complained to the council did so only once, with 10 per cent complaining twice.

The complaints were received equally from men and women. However, of the 30 complainants who wrote in three times or more, 25 were men.

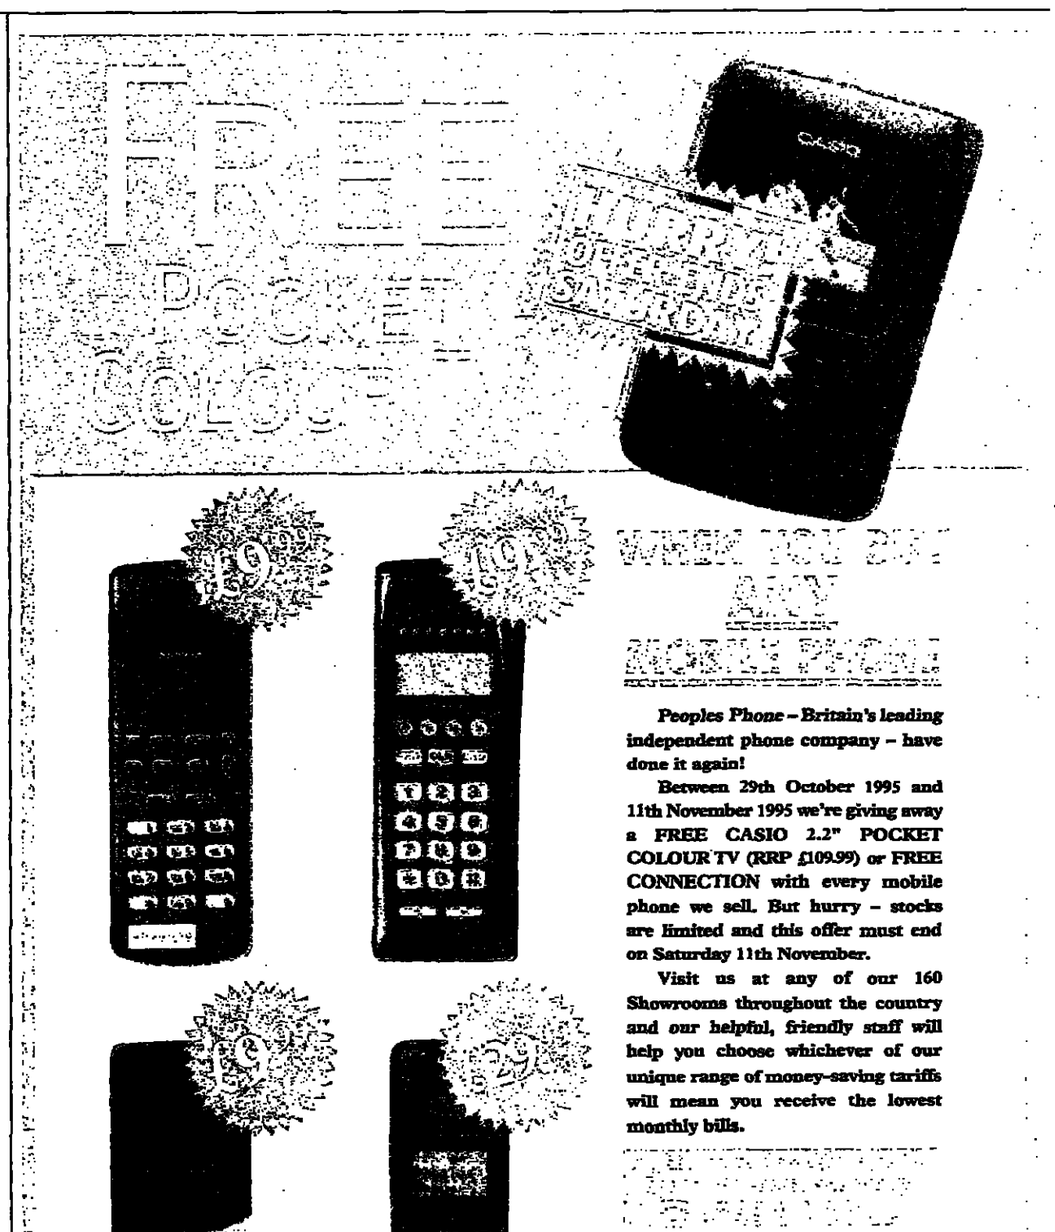

Nearly a quarter of all complainants felt that there had been a general decline in the quality of broadcasting.

Busy GPs strike off 800 patients

BY JEREMY LAURANCE

Meale: seeking talks with health authority

DOCTORS have struck off more than 800 patients because they say they cannot cope with the workload. The GPs' move, thought to be unprecedented, has been criticised by the local health authority and MP.

Patients of the seven-partner Roundwood practice in Mansfield, Nottinghamshire, were given a week's notice. The practice, which took the decision because one GP is leaving and another is retiring, has received many complaints.

The doctors decided to redraw the practice's boundary so that it covered a smaller area, and letters were sent to 837 patients last week telling them they were being removed from the list. Some of those affected have been registered with the practice for more than 60 years.

Michelle Carter, 32, said she had been with the surgery all her life and did not want to change. "How can they do such a heartless thing? I am disgusted."

Alan Meale, Labour MP for Mansfield, said he was seeking an urgent meeting with the health authority. "The patients, including some very old people, have been left in the wilderness."

Barbara Meeke, deputy director of North Nottinghamshire Health Authority, said: "All practices have the right to take patients off their lists but it is the sheer scale of this that is causing problems." The practice said it was facing an "ever increasing demand on doctors' time" and 12 other local practices were willing to take on the patients.

GMC clamps down on incompetent doctors from overseas

BY JEREMY LAURANCE, HEALTH CORRESPONDENT

RULES to prevent incompetent doctors from overseas practising in Britain are to be introduced by the General Medical Council.

Up to 2,500 doctors from countries outside Europe apply to work in Britain each year but only a quarter are tested on their knowledge of English and their medical competence. In future, all applicants will be required to demonstrate their "capability for practice".

The GMC, which is responsible for maintaining professional standards in medicine, says change is essential to safeguard the public. Last year the GMC's overseas committee considered allegations of incompetence involving 193 overseas doctors with limited registration, 18 per cent up on the previous year.

The new rules will not apply to doctors from the European Economic Area who have an automatic right to practise here. The EEA comprises the countries of the EC plus Austria, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden.

The council of the GMC yesterday agreed a report by its overseas committee which says that it cannot defend its accountability to the public under the present system.

Currently, doctors from non-European countries have to pass the GMC's test of medical and linguistic ability. However, exemption is granted if the doctor is sponsored by two specialists in their home country and gains acceptance to a training course run by one of the medical royal colleges. It is also granted if the doctor has a qualification from a medical school on the GMC's approved list.

Three quarters of non-EU doctors gain exemption from the test. Successful applicants are granted limited registration, allowing them to practise under supervision for up to four years. The overseas committee says that the exemption system means that doctors with qualifications that are not accepted may be of much higher quality than some of those whose qualifications are accepted.

Under the new proposals agreed yesterday, the approved list of medical schools is to be dropped and all applicants must satisfy the GMC of their "competence, communication and interpersonal skills". A tougher, two-part test of medical knowledge will be introduced and be preceded by an English test.

The GMC is to discuss with the royal medical colleges whether other kinds of objective evidence of capability might be acceptable.

Dr Sriramashetty Venugopal, a member of the GMC's overseas committee and president of the Overseas Doctors' Association, said: "Many overseas doctors are coming through the sponsorship route and we are not sure what their standards are."

Evans shuns attention

Three years in jail for bogus nurse

A man who gained agency nursing jobs in South Wales hospitals by lying about his qualifications was jailed for three years yesterday. Patients were given powerful drugs by Huw Evans during his seven years of service at three hospitals and nursing homes. He was caught after he gave James, his 13-month-old son, 20 times the normal dose of insulin when the child was taken to hospital with a minor illness. Evans, 28, of Trealaw, Mid Glamorgan, admitted assault and deception. Cardiff Crown Court was told that Evans's wife had since left him. The University Hospital of Wales Healthcare NHS Trust said that it had tightened vetting procedures.

Resentful MPs must grow accustomed to Nolan's face

RIDDELL ON POLITICS

The Nolan process is the main gainer from this week's votes on the outside interests of MPs. It is a process because last May's report was only the first of a planned series on standards in public life. Unlike previous inquiries or royal commissions, which had a finite life and remit, the committee under Lord Nolan is a standing body whose members have an initial term of three years. The decisions by the Government and the Commons to accept the thrust, if not some key details, of its first report have considerably strengthened its authority.

When it was set up a year ago, John Major said he wanted the committee to become "an ethical workshop" to provide "running repairs on standards in public life". But during its public hearings earlier this year it developed into much more: what Professor Peter Hennessy calls in The Hidden Wiring "a miniature, if informal, constitutional convention". It is not just a commentary on constitutional practices produced by 16½ years of one-party rule.

More important is the standing that the committee has as a respected, non-partisan body which carries such weight that it cannot be ignored like one-off inquiries. That is precisely what irks many MPs. They do not like being given advice by outsiders. But by setting up Nolan in October 1994 after a series of allegations of abuse against MPs and ministers, Mr Major admitted that the Commons was unable to examine its own faults. The Commons' past record and the failure so far of the American Congress to clean up campaign finance and relations with lobbyists shows how legislatures are generally unable to reform themselves. They need a push from outside, either from the electorate or from independent inquiries.

Many MPs have got muddled about the respective roles of Nolan and the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards (now confirmed as Sir Gordon Downey, a retired civil servant with close knowledge of the Commons). Nolan's function is to see whether the structure of rules works and to recommend changes, while the commissioner's job is to implement and monitor the rules. Nicholas Winterton, the maverick Tory, got very worked up about Sir Gordon on Monday, in part because he will be paid a salary more than twice that of an MP for a four-day week, and because "for the first time Parliament will have an outsider deciding its behaviour". This a common cry among Tory opponents of Nolan. The commissioner, however, will be essentially an adviser, reporting to the new committee on standards and privileges. The Commons itself will continue to decide whether to discipline MPs.

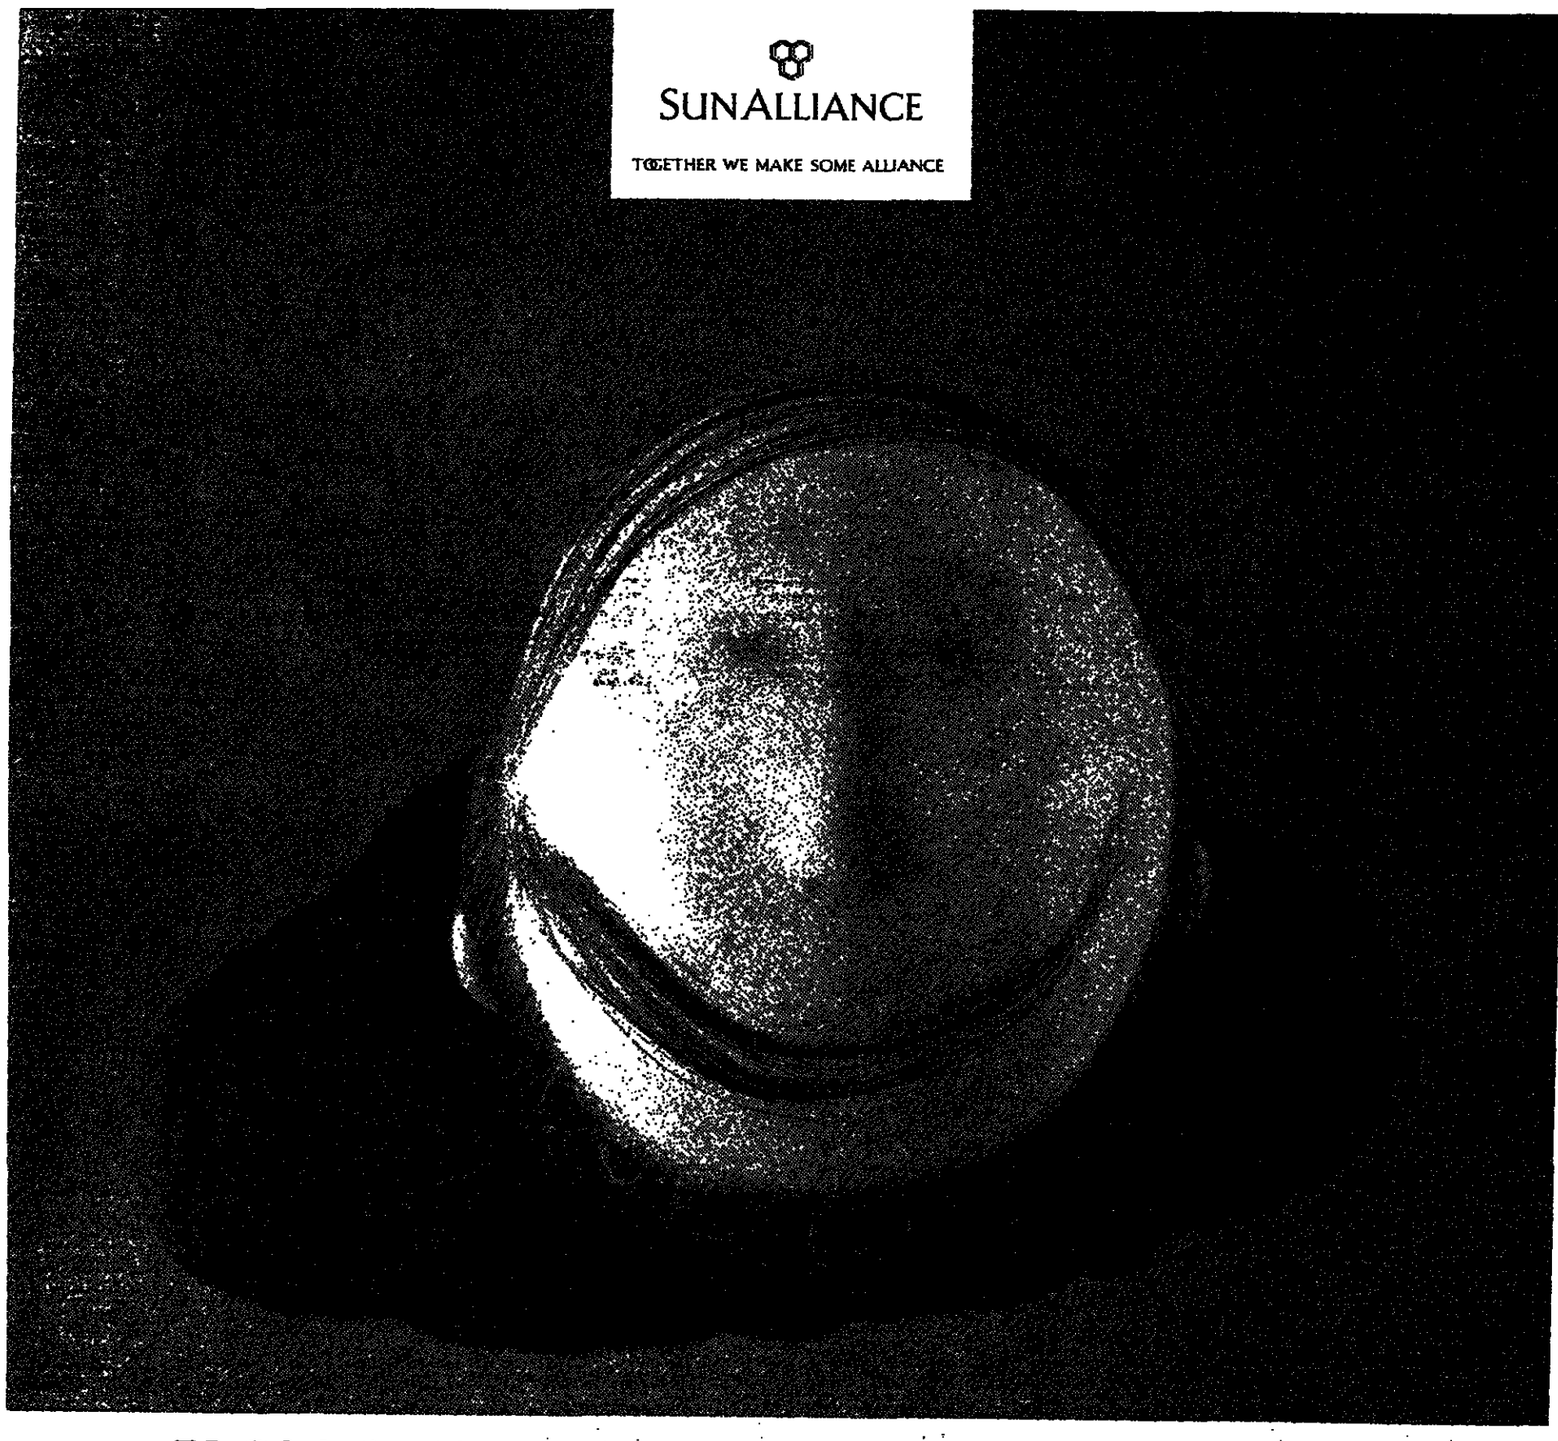

But the continued existence of Nolan means that an outside body will be looking over the shoulder of MPs to see how the new arrangements work and whether they restore public confidence. The committee has said it intends to return to the issue of consultancies, and it is planning to hold sessions reviewing the results of its first report in six months. This will follow its second inquiry into local spending bodies, such as institutions of further and higher education, grant-maintained schools and housing associations. Public hearings start next week.

The Nolan committee is meeting today to take stock after recent debates in the Commons and Lords. A minority of its members have wanted to examine the financing of political parties, though the majority have been wary of touching so sensitive a subject ahead of the next election. Some Conservatives have wanted the question of MPs' pay to be referred to Nolan, but this has so far been opposed by Mr Major. Many Tory MPs resent the extent of the Nolan committee's influence, but it is now the only body with the authority, and record, to tackle pay. It is rapidly becoming a permanent part of Britain's flexible constitution.

Corner property near the Queen Mother goes on the market with the world's biggest asking price

Inside and out: a cross-section of the developers' plan, and the view from St James's Street of the building that once housed Tory rebels

Call it a palace, call it a home. Without £60m, don't call at all

By Alan Hamilton

PROPERTY prices may be sluggish across much of the land, but the world's most expensive private home is about to be created in St James's, London. Those requiring mortgages can save themselves the bother of sending for the estate agents' particulars: the price will be £60 million.

There is a very limited mailing list for this price band. Perhaps a dozen people in the world would wish to afford 74 St James's Street as a London pied-à-terre, and the Mayfair developers are currently in negotiation with two of them.

One is believed to be the Maktoum family of Dubai: the other, whose anonymity is being carefully preserved, could be one of several: the Sultan of Brunei, who has at least five homes in London; Prince Waleed of the Saudi royal family; or Ong Bong Seng, one of the wealthiest traders in Singapore.

The eventual purchaser will get a palace and a half, with two atriums furnished with waterfalls and exotic shrubbery, a ballroom with a 50ft ceiling, 24 bathrooms, a basement swimming pool and a top-floor master bedroom covering 1,225 square feet with a view over Green Park and the rooftops of a near neighbour, Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother, who is a royal wave away at Clarence House.

Conversion will include raising the glazed dome, and linking the atriums with a vast rooftop greenhouse, which could become London's finest roof garden.

From the outside, the imposing stone façade on the corner of Little St James's Street appears grand but anonymous. The interior has a history of political intrigue. Built in 1845 for £29,000, it originally housed the Conservative Club, a haven for dissident Tories who did not deign to join the Carlton. In 1941, the Bath Club moved in after its Dover Street home had been burnt down and the two eventually merged.

Throughout most of the Sixties the building stood empty. In 1971 it became the London headquarters of McKinsey, management consultants. It has again stood empty since 1993.

Wiggins, the developers, said yesterday that work on creating the interior would probably start in six months' time, when the present redundant offices had been stripped out and a £1 million security system installed. By that time, they hope a purchaser will have signed contracts. Conversions on this scale are not, as rule, carried out speculatively.

London has not seen such a house on offer since 1988 when the Holme, Decimus Burton's Regency villa in Regent's Park, came on the market at £30 million at the height of the property boom. It had changed hands only four years previously for a mere £5 million. The present owner of the Holme is the Saudi Prince Khaled, who is said to occupy it for little more than two weeks a year.

At £60 million, the new owner of 74 St James's Street may feel like staying in town a little longer.

Staff perk cut on packed sleeper

By Jonathan Prynn, Transport Correspondent

BRITISH RAIL staff discounts on the Fort William sleeper are to be stopped because the once doomed service to the west Highlands is now so popular. Ordinary passengers have to book berths weeks in advance.

Demand for the overnight train from London, formerly derided as the most heavily subsidised in Europe, has soared since British Rail decided to close it last spring, provoking a high-profile campaign to save it.

The renaissance of the 94-year-old service has prompted ScotRail to propose dropping the "two for the price of one" perk available to all BR employees. From next month, they will have to book at the normal £124 return price paid by other passengers.

The move was welcomed by Highland campaigners for the service, who were angered when the number of carriages on the service was cut from four to two after it was reprieved in September. Christopher Monckton, an estate owner near Rannoch station and one of the most regular users of the sleeper, said: "I am sorry for the staff as it was no doubt pleasant to get a berth for free, but I am not at all surprised because it is just so full."

The service is running close to capacity even during the middle of the week, and campaigners claim that weekend reservations often have to be made months in advance. ScotRail has delayed its plans to cut the service from two coaches to one during the winter.

A British Rail source said: "The whole campaign to save the sleeper has been the best PR campaign in the history of the railways." John Ellis, director of ScotRail, is talking to Highland Regional Council about restoring a four-coach service next summer.

Binmen call for stress counselling

By A Staff Reporter

A LABOUR council may offer its refuse collection operatives — once known simply as binmen — counselling for stress. The dustmen, gardeners and cleaners say that work-related tension gives them nightmares, palpitations and can lead to impotence.

Officials at Greenwich council in southeast London have set up a working party to examine how the operatives can be helped to unwind after the rigours of a hectic day. Eventually, the entire staff of 13,000 could benefit from the attention of carers trained to listen to their woes.

Janice Harwood, a spokeswoman, said: "It is not something we are making a big deal of. Everyone on the staff suffers stress, from the chief executive to dustmen." The working party will report in six months after examine European law and studying policies in Scandinavia.

Waller: house spoilt residential area

Tory MP owed £1,000 in council tax

BY PAUL WILKINSON

A TORY MP owed a Labour council more than £1,000 in two years' unpaid council tax, a court was told yesterday. Gary Waller, the representative for Keighley, avoided a jail sentence when magistrates were told that a cheque had been received. The case was adjourned to allow the payment to be processed.

The MP, who did not attend the hearing in Dewsbury, West Yorkshire, faced two summonses from Kirklees council over the council tax for an £80,000 four-bedroomed detached house he owns in nearby Cleckheaton. Neighbours say the house has been unoccupied for 16 years and recently raised a petition calling on the MP to clean up the property because it was spoiling the middle-class residential area.

Mr Waller, 49, owes £1,154.72 including costs. The initial bill was followed by three reminders before the council obtained two liability orders from Huddersfield magistrates. One for £727.22 was issued on June 28 and another for £296 on August 25. They allow the council to take payment directly from earnings or send in the bailiffs.

When the money was still not recovered the council returned to court where it was entitled to seek an order committing the MP to prison. Stephen Jones, for the council, said a cheque for the full amount had been received and asked for the case to be adjourned until December 6 for it to clear.

Inquiry criticises 'hurried' government strategies on classroom standards

Give failing schools more of a chance, say experts

BY JOHN O'LEARY, EDUCATION EDITOR

FAILING schools cannot be transformed overnight, an independent think-tank said yesterday in a report detailing 11 success stories which challenged the Government's recipe for improving substandard education.

The National Commission on Education, which last year produced a blueprint for the state system, criticised the "recent hurried strategies" on failing schools. Teachers had to be given more time to improve schools in poor areas.

The 370-page report, Success against the odds, found common factors in the 11 schools, which had become more popular with parents and had improved examination results. Links included clear leadership by head teachers, strong discipline and involvement by parents.

But the authors of the study, who included leading academics and businessmen such as Howard Davies, the Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, found that improvement was a slow process.

"The rate and nature of improvement is often characterised by 'two steps forward, one step back' when measured against schools in more advantaged settings", the report said. Professor Margaret Maden, of Keele University, until recently director of Education in Warwickshire, said results at the 11 schools in the study were only beginning to improve after many years of hard work. Government inspectors, by contrast, expected failing schools to improve "more or less overnight".

The Office for Standards in Education, she said, had "to be a lot clearer over what can be expected in one or two years". That might be long enough to begin to improve a school's morale and lay the foundations for improvement.

More than 100 schools out of 5,000 inspected by Ofsted inspectors have been found to be failing their pupils. They are given 40 days to prepare an action plan and up to two years to show improvement while ministers decide whether to send in a "hit squad" to manage the school.

Hackney Downs School, in east London, the only school yet to be transferred to an Education Association, was recommended for closure only months after its removal from Hackney education authority. It had been labelled a failure just over a year earlier. Professor Maden, a co-author of the study, said she did not dispute the closure of Hackney Downs, which was surplus to requirements. But national policies needed rethinking.

The commission's report emphasises above all the leadership qualities of the headteacher, who must instil a belief in the school's potential to succeed. "The right sort of leadership is at the heart of an effective school," the study says. Other important factors included improvements in a school's physical environment, even against tight budgets, which boosted the self-esteem of staff and pupils. Good pupil behaviour was another key to a successful school, although clarity in a school's policy was more important than the detail of, for example, dress code.

Ofsted said some schools had already demonstrated improvement within the Government's timescale. "For the children whose education is being blighted by weak schools, anything that takes longer than two years will be too late."

Robin Squire, the Education Minister, said: "This study reinforces the message that schools can improve themselves, whatever the obstacles. No matter how unpromising the environment, there is always scope for improvement." Even the smallest gain should be celebrated. Setting standards and careful monitoring of progress were crucial.

The 11 schools in the study were: Pair Furlong Primary School, Bristol; Crowcroft Park Primary School, Manchester; Blaengwrach Primary School, Cwmgwrach, West Glamorgan; Columbia Primary School, London; Lochgelly North Special School, Fife; Burntwood Secondary Girls School, London; Haywood High School, Stoke on Trent; Hazelwood Integrated College, Newtownabbey, Co Antrim; St Michael's RC Comprehensive School, Billingham, Cleveland; The Sutton Centre, Sutton in Ashfield, Nottinghamshire; Selly Park Girls School, Birmingham.

GILL ALLEN

Success stories: Columbia Primary School, Bethnal Green, and, below, St Michael's, Billingham, Cleveland

Davies: one of the report's authors

SELLY PARK GIRLS

Problem: This Birmingham school faced closure in 1986 with an "appalling academic record" and shabby buildings. English was the second tongue for eight in ten pupils.
Solution: A new head teacher reorganised staff and transformed the atmosphere by persuading councillors that the largely Muslim intake needed a girls' school. Previous non-examination groups take vocational courses, and there is heavy emphasis on information technology.
Results: Enrolment is up and almost 30 per cent of girls achieved five A-C grade passes at GCSE last year, compared with 2 per cent a decade ago.

COLUMBIA PRIMARY

Problem: More than 70 per cent of the pupils at this school in Bethnal Green, east London, have English as a second language and are poor enough to qualify for free school meals.
Solution: Evaluation by external consultants led to a school development plan concentrating on behaviour and teaching methods. All adults and children were involved in drawing up a code of behaviour, which brought about dramatic improvements.Results: Reading scores are well above average for Tower Hamlets. Ofsted inspectors found 80 per cent of lessons "good or very good".

ST MICHAEL'S, BILLINGHAM

Problem: Community in Cleveland had high unemployment. Numbers were falling and the school was likely to close ten years ago.
Solution: Catholic parents mobilised to save the school and have supported it, financially and educationally. The core of long-serving teachers and an approachable head teacher have inspired newcomers to do more than contracts require. Prominent role for drama to instil confidence.
Results: School is now oversubscribed, with a third of places taken by non-Catholics. Half the pupils passed five O levels last year, compared with a third in 1990.

THE SUTTON CENTRE

Problem: A futuristic community school in a shopping centre in Mansfield, Nottinghamshire, trying to integrate adults and adolescents. It did not offer O levels, and pupil numbers dropped to almost half the original roll.
Solution: Ambitious targets for academic improvement. Pupils keep work diaries, and a "taster" examination has been introduced to prepare teenagers for GCSE. The school is pioneering vocational courses. Extra teaching sessions at weekends are well attended.
Results: Examination results are improving but assessors predict that there will be no overnight transformation.

Brent Spar activists fined for tug offence

Three Greenpeace activists who chained themselves to a tug in Aberdeen harbour and two divers who tied chains to its propeller to try to prevent the scuttling of the Brent Spar oil platform were fined yesterday. Divers Arnd Petry, 25, and Oliver Sommer, 28, both from Germany, were fined £75 each. James Saulino, 37, from Bushey, Hertfordshire, and Heike Staudigl and Thomas Prax, 33, both from Germany, were fined £50 each at Aberdeen Sheriff Court.

Student dies

A student at Oxford Brookes University died yesterday when he fell from a car after climbing half out of the window and hanging onto the roof in a practice known as "surfing". Thomas Pickett, 24, from Colchester, Essex, hit his head on a brick wall.

Gift unchanged

The £10 Christmas bonus paid to pensioners since 1972 will remain unchanged, the Government announced in a written reply. Labour had called for it to be increased. To keep pace with the inflation rate, the payment would need to be £69.33.

Boy expelled

A 14-year-old boy has been expelled from Hayling School, Hayling Island, Hampshire, after a younger pupil was found tied to climbing bars in the school hall by his tie. Wayne Parker, 11, was taken to hospital with neck injuries. Police were called in.

Coach crash trial

Seven employees of a travel company were sent for trial at Canterbury Crown Court after a coach crash on the M2 in Kent in November 1993 in which nine American tourists and their British driver died. They are accused of conspiring to falsify drivers' records.

Air of suspense

Sir Tim Rice's plans to build an observatory have been left in mid-air by councillors. Kerrick District Council decided to hold a site meeting at the 50-year-old lyricist's home beside the River Helford, Cornwall, before making a decision.

Marksmen keep watch as Cabinet ministers report new death threats

Assassin's family asks Israel for forgiveness

FROM CHRISTOPHER WALKER IN JERUSALEM AND MICHAEL BINYON IN DAMASCUS

THE family of the young Jew who assassinated Yitzhak Rabin issued an apology for the murder yesterday as a commission of inquiry into the former Prime Minister's security was announced and two senior members of the Israeli equivalent of MI5 lost their posts.

The centre-left Government went into a state of siege with more Cabinet ministers reporting death threats from Jewish opponents of the peace process and the Attorney-General voicing fears of the imminent likelihood of another political murder. The road outside the Prime Minister's office was closed and marksmen were posted around it.

The Cabinet Office in Jerusalem was transformed into a fortress as the Cabinet met in emergency session to set up an inquiry commission similar to that appointed to investigate grave security errors in the 1973 Yom Kippur War. For the first time, journalists were barred free access to ministers.

The letter of apology for Saturday night's killing was attached to a tarpaulin draped to protect the home of the parents of 25-year-old Yigal Amir. His parents, Shlomo and Geula, and six of their children remained locked inside, under secret service surveillance. Another son, Hagai, 27, has been jailed for his possible part in a right-wing plot to sabotage the peace deal with the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

The letter read: "Deeply ashamed, mourning and with bowed head, we ask for forgiveness and absolution from Mrs Rabin, from the family and from all the people of Israel, and hereby declare our rejection of all acts of violence." But Leah Rabin, the dead leader's widow, had already let it be known that she regarded any apology as too little and too late.

Informal contacts between Israeli politicians began yesterday towards forming a new Labour-led government, although the official Jewish mourning period for Mr Rabin does not end until Sunday night.

Labour Party sources said attempts were under way to broaden the present coalition with its razor-thin majority in the 120-seat Knesset by adding one or more of the minority religious parties.

Aides of Shimon Peres, the acting Prime Minister, said he would seek to appoint a Cabinet able to remain in power until November 1996, when a general election is due in which the future of the peace process will be the main issue.

Malcolm Rifkind, the Foreign Secretary, will today urge Mr Peres to seize the opportunity to conclude peace with Syria, which he said was clearly evident after talks with President Assad in Damascus. The Syrian leader told Mr Rifkind that Damascus was now ready to move "very quickly".

Settlers fear a war of Jew pitted against Jew

FROM ROSS DUNN IN KIRYAT ARBA, OCCUPIED WEST BANK

JEWISH settler David Waldman spent three sleepless nights, tormented by the death of Yitzak Rabin, a man he saw as a traitor to the state of Israel.

Only a handful of settlers were celebrating the assassination of the Prime Minister by a fellow Jew, said Mr Waldman. The vast majority, while opposing the slain leader's policies, never wished to see him killed, added the former rabbi turned English teacher.

"Last night was the first night I actually slept well. I was tossing and turning the other nights, and a lot of people were tossing and turning because it has got to the point where we are afraid of what is going to happen."

Kiryat Arba, a Jewish settlement near Hebron, has a reputation for political extremism. Its most infamous resident, Baruch Goldstein, shocked the world last year when he went to a Hebron mosque and opened fire on unsuspecting worshippers, killing 29. Goldstein was himself killed by enraged Arabs.

Another resident, Aryeh Bar-Yosef, a French immigrant who regularly prays at the Goldstein shrine, did not condemn the killing of Mr Rabin: "It is joyful for God, that an evil person has died. Rabin was the head of the traitors ... he was the evil among evils."

The likes of Mr Bar-Josef are despised by leftwingers, such as Avraham Peso, an artist, who in a fit of anger this week daubed the Goldstein memorial with black paint. "I saw people singing and dancing [over the death of Mr Rabin] and I couldn't stand it any more. I have been crying ever since Rabin was killed."

Mr Peso said. But his protest reinforced some of Mr Waldman's worst fears — for a fresh cycle of violence that will pit Jew against Jew.

Mr Waldman sees the territory — which settlers refer to by the biblical names of Judaea and Samaria — as given to Jews by God. The assassination has "hurt our cause", he said. "We belong here not by the right of force but by the force of right."

Court clears way for women fighter pilots

BY MICHAEL EVANS DEFENCE CORRESPONDENT

ISRAEL could have its first woman fighter pilot after a ruling in the Israeli Supreme Court yesterday that overturned a long-standing ban on women in combat.

Although all Israeli women are called up for service and can train for the same roles as men, they are banned by law from using their training in combat. Yesterday, however, the Supreme Court allowed an appeal by Alice Miller, 23, a commercial pilot and air force aeronautics engineer born in South Africa, against the military for barring her from the fighter pilots' training course.

Five judges ruled three to two that the air force had to allow her to take the necessary examinations and, if she passed, to start the training course. Although many other countries, including Britain, America, Canada, Denmark and The Netherlands, allow women to train as fighter pilots, Israel has resisted a change in policy, partly because of the fear of a woman falling into enemy hands.

Israeli sources said it was not a question of a woman's capability to fly a fighter aircraft. The sources said that, apart from the risk of caprure, it was felt to be a poor investment to train a woman as a fighter pilot when she might get married and leave to have children.

Miss Miller said: "I feel a lot of tension. It will be hard to be a woman among men, especially with the attitudes the men express about women on this matter."

Although women did fly in the air force in the state's early years, a ban was imposed later. Asked to explain it, Ezer Weizman, then air force chief and now President of Israel, remarked: "The best men, for pilot training. The best women, for the pilots."

Miller: "It will be hard to be a woman among men"

WORLD SUMMARY

Raid adds to tension in Rwanda

Nairobi: Rwanda continued a downward spiral of violence approaching outright war between its Hutu and Tutsi communities after the Government announced yesterday that its Tutsi-dominated army had attacked a Hutu militia training camp. It said 171 men were killed and 15 captured in the raid on a tiny island in Lake Kivu (Sam Kiley, Africa Correspondent, writes).

The raid, in which five members of the Rwandan Army were also killed and 13 wounded, is an indication that the Government is taking a tough new approach to Hutu insurgency.

Sudan gives call to arms

Sudan's Islamic fundamentalist regime has called for a general mobilisation to stem a tide of Christian and animist rebel victories in the south, where Ugandan and Tanzanian armed forces have allegedly been supporting the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (Sam Kiley writes).

President al-Bashir "called on all the sectors of the people and youth immediately to head for the popular defence camps," the state radio said.

Jaffna cash

Colombo: Sri Lanka increased its war budget by 30 per cent, to 33 billion rupees (£412 million), to help to pay for its new drive against the separatist Tamil Tigers in the Jaffna peninsula.

Lawyers strike

Palermo: Defence lawyers in the Sicilian capital went on strike in protest at the arrest of the president of the provincial government for allegedly helping to harbour a fugitive Mafia boss. (Reuter)

Long service

Bangkok: What is said to be the world's longest buffet — 4,963ft — is to be served in Thailand to mark the 50-year reign of the world's longest-serving monarch, King Bhumibol Adulyadej. (AP)

Sudden retreat by Powell dismays army of supporters

FROM TOM RHODES IN WASHINGTON

COLIN POWELL, who has decided not run for the White House, became the hottest property in America, a man whose popular appeal among the public cut through the political divide.

President Clinton offered him the vice-presidency and the State Department. The Republicans courted his approval and the centre looked to him for leadership.

In the end, as he had always said, the decision lay not with the popular support of the people but with those closest to him, his wife, Alma, and their children. The death of Yitzhak Rabin had proved a poignant reminder of what can happen to those in high office.

The rumours had been swirling through Washington since before General Powell retired as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in September 1993. A man who had led America to Gulf War victory, whose approval ratings outshone any in government, could not be ignored. As early as 1992, Vernon Jordan, the powerful lawyer and confidant of Bill Clinton and General Powell, had asked the soldier: "Your polls are running off the charts. Are you interested in running as Clinton's Vice-President?"

Last December General Powell was told by Mr Clinton that Warren Christopher wanted to leave his post as Secretary of State and he wanted the general to take over the department. In both cases the silent, secretive General Powell declined, leaving analysts more convinced than ever that he would run for the White House.

General Powell fuelled the fires by saying he had substantial differences of opinion with the Clinton Administration and wanted to finish a memoir that would disclose much about his thinking.

The Citizens for Colin Powell, an unauthorised committee created in the spring of last year to thrust the retired general towards the Republican nomination, monitored his approval ratings daily. "We are saddened and very disappointed by his decision," Chuck Kelly, its organiser, said yesterday. "It is a sad decision both for this country and for the world."

Christopher: his post was offered to Powell

Only a week before, Mr Kelly had been trumpeting the latest polls indicating that General Powell was leading Mr Clinton by a margin of ten percentage points. There had been no doubt among his supporters that he would run.

The launch of his book, My American Dream, had driven speculation to fever pitch. In a teasing interview with Time magazine, which published excerpts, he said he had the skills needed for the White House: "The last two years I have done no interviews, no television and people are wondering what 'Forrest Gump' Colin Powell stands for. Well they are about to find out."

Yesterday the message from General Powell was one of anti-climax. The months of hype ended in a drab north Virginia hotel. The question on many lips was simple: What had it all been for?

Colin and Alma Powell at the general's retirement ceremony in 1993: from the outset Mrs Powell was bitterly opposed to her husband running for President

General heeded final command of a loyal wife

BY MARTIN FLETCHER

ALMA finally got her way. Colin Powell's wife and most loyal partner for the past 33 years was from the outset bitterly opposed to her husband running for President, and in the end she prevailed.

Having spent almost all her adult life trailing her husband around America and the world, Mrs Powell longed to spend time in their new $1.3 million home in Virginia. At 57, she longed to have her husband to herself. She dreaded the prospect of the media exposing the most intimate details of their family life, but above all she feared for his safety as the first serious black contender for the Oval Office. "It just takes one nut," she told friends.

Last summer she implored Richard Armitage, one of her husband's closest advisers: "Tell him no." According to Bruce Llewellyn, the general's cousin and confidant, Mrs Powell remained "adamant" to the last.

Two developments in the past two weeks seem finally to have clinched her case. One was a Newsweek disclosure that she had for ten years taken medication for depression. This was a foretaste of the sort of intensely personal scrutiny she and her three children would have faced.

The second was Saturday's assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. As one Republican consultant observed: "You don't need three degrees in rocket science to figure out that the minute she heard about the assassination she turned to her husband and said 'See, see, see'."

The two met on a blind double-date in 1961. They married just before General Powell's first tour of duty in Vietnam, and despite the reservations of her father, the principal of a black high school in Birmingham, Alabama, who thought his daughter could do better than a soldier-son of West Indian immigrants from the Bronx.

The Powells' first child, Michael, was born seven months after their wedding while General Powell was deep in the Vietnamese jungle. Over the next three decades, Alma raised Michael and two daughters, while her husband chopped and changed between Vietnam, Korea, West Germany, umpteen American army bases and gruelling jobs in the Pentagon and White House.

Mrs Powell was always, as one friend put it, "a wonderful army wife, a good trooper". But General Powell always insisted the decision would be reached jointly and finally, it seems, she put her foot down. If her husband needed things to do, she joked to friends, "there are plenty of things to fix around the house".

Dirty game few relish playing

FROM MARTIN FLETCHER IN WASHINGTON

COLIN POWELL'S decision not to seek the White House leaves the Republican field looking weak and is bound to ignite debate over whether the sheer nastiness of presidential elections is frightening the best candidates away.

General Powell joins a long list of prominent Republicans who saw President Clinton's vulnerability and considered joining the most open race for the party's nomination since 1979, but were deterred by the horrors that that entailed.

They include former Vice-President Dan Quayle, the former Cabinet secretaries and conservative heroes Jack Kemp and William Bennett, the former Defence Secretary Richard Cheney and various governors. These people saw how the most sordid details of Mr Clinton's personal life were exposed to the world during the 1992 campaign. They knew their rivals would spend huge sums on "opposition research" designed to dig up muck. They knew they would have to spend the better part of two years living in hotel rooms, begging for money and scarcely seeing their families.

Mr Kemp cited the "grotesqueries" of fundraising when he cried off. Ted Welch, chief fundraiser for Lamar Alexander, the former Tennessee governor, said in May that his team had to raise $55,000 (£35,000) a day for the rest of the year if Mr Alexander were to be a serious player in the race.

General Powell's decision leaves the 72-year-old Senate leader, Robert Dole, a clear favourite for the Republican nomination. The second tier of candidates include Phil Gramm, the 53-year-old Texas senator; Mr Alexander, who is 55 and was also President Bush's Education Secretary; and Pat Buchanan, the 56-year-old conservative commentator who ran Mr Bush so close in the 1992 New Hampshire primary.

Steve Forbes, a 48-year-old publishing tycoon, is pouring millions of dollars into television advertisements and has begun rising in the polls.

Republicans fail in Southern quest

BY MARTIN FLETCHER

JUBILANT Democrats proclaimed yesterday the end of the great Republican surge of 1994. A year after the Grand Old Party seized Congress for the first time in four decades, it suffered setbacks in Tuesday's state elections that Democratic leaders trumpeted as a rejection of the "Republican Revolution" and the deep cuts in cherished social programmes it entails.

The Republicans failed to capture their first Southern state house since the Civil War, in Virginia. They failed by a whisker to win the governorship of Kentucky. They retained Mississippi's governorship, but made none of the advances they had hoped for in the Mississippi Senate.

Compounding the Republicans' frustration, the Democrats won two by-elections to take control of Maine's House of Representatives and enjoyed a net gain of three seats in New Jersey's General Assembly.

It was the Democrats' best night since Bill Clinton won the White House in 1992, but all the evidence suggested that voters were motivated far more by their fear of Republican extremism than any enthusiasm for the President.

"The American people confirmed what we have said all along — that they will reject the extremism demonstrated in a number of pieces of the right-wing agenda the Republicans have been pushing through Congress," Tom Dashcle, the Democrats' Senate leader, said. "The Republican message of radicalism and extremism was rejected," Richard Gephardt, the House Democratic leader, said.

Frank Jordan, San Franciso's Mayor, faces a December 12 run-off election with Willie Brown, the former California Assembly Speaker, after he failed to secure 50 per cent of the vote.

Mr Jordan will be ruing his impetuous decision to join two radio talk show hosts in a nude shower in an attempt to show himself in tune with the city's sense of humour. It ended up sabotaging his campaign message of responsible government. "It spoke volumes about his lack of judgment," a Brown aide said.

Jordan: nude photocall cost him victory

Russia agrees to Bosnia troops commanded by US

From Charles Bremner in Brussels and Tom Rhodes in Washington

RUSSIA agreed yesterday to send troops to Bosnia-Herzegovina under a US commander, but American and Russian ministers left unsettled the question of overall control in the operation, which is being planned by Nato.

General Pavel Grachev, the Russian defence chief, and William Perry, the US Defence Secretary, said in Brussels yesterday that they had reached an arrangement which satisfied Russia's condition that its troops must not be commanded by Nato.

"This plan preserves unity of command, but does not require Russian forces to be under Nato command," said Mr Perry. However, both emphasised that the key question of political control of the peacekeeping operation would be decided later.

A contingent of about 1,000 Russian combat troops is expected to join the planned multinational force which will move in if a peace accord is reached at talks under way in Dayton, Ohio.

Enduring Russian abhorrence for Nato forced the need for a delicate formula to achieve a Russian presence in the Bosnian police operation.

America's insistence that those who committed atrocities in Bosnia-Herzegovina should be brought to justice was undermined yesterday after the Clinton Administration admitted withholding intelligence from a United Nations tribunal investigating war crimes.

Judge Richard Goldstone, the chief prosecutor for The Hague tribunal, had asked for the transcript of an alleged conversation between Ratko Mladic, the Bosnian Serb military commander, and Yugoslav army officers, a recording said to prove their complicity in the attack on Srebrenica and providing a direct link with Belgrade. The future of General Mladic and Radovan Karadzic, the Bosnian Serb leader, has become pivotal to the peace talks. President Milosevic of Serbia is said to be wavering over a draft constitution for Bosnia demanding the early removal from power of both men, who have been indicted for war crimes by the United Nations tribunal.

The US-Russian meeting was held amid the continuing leadership vacuum at Nato. Three weeks since a domestic political scandal forced the resignation of Willy Claes, the Belgian Secretary-General, the US is withholding support for the man preferred by most European members.

Britain, France and Germany have backed Ruud Lubbers, the former Dutch Prime Minister. US reluctance is believed to spring from irritation at the manner in which the European members, and France in particular, seemed to have tried to rush through their choice.

Mr Perry said on Tuesday that the Clinton Administration had not decided whom to support. "As far as we're concerned, the candidacy is still open," he said.

Reserves on alert

The Armed Forces Minister, Nicholas Soames, yesterday called for 350 volunteers from the Territorial Army and the regular army reserve — primarily linguists, meteorologists, intelligence and public relations officers — to serve with the Nato Peace Implementation Force in Bosnia. If a peace agreement is reached in Dayton, Ohio, 60,000 troops are expected to police the deal.

Senate puts González in 'dirty war' firing line

From Reuter in Madrid

THE Spanish Senate set up a committee yesterday to investigate accusations that the Government of Felipe González, the Prime Minister, knew of a "dirty war" against Basque separatist guerrillas in the 1980s.

The committee, which could be even more damaging to Señor González than the present court investigations, will begin proceedings next Thursday, debating how to investigate the charges. The opposition wants the embattled Prime Minister to give evidence, an idea the Socialists reject.

The Government has repeatedly denied any involvement in the Anti-terrorist Liberation Groups (Gal) — a front for security forces and hired gunmen — which kidnapped, bombed, tortured and murdered suspected Eta guerrillas from 1983 to 1987. But the opposition, emboldened by evidence from former security and military intelligence chiefs, as well as disgruntled Socialists, pushed through the Senate last month a vote to create a special investigating committee. Court cases have already begun and the Supreme Court is trying to assess whether there is enough evidence to try Señor González for the "dirty war", which claimed 27 lives. It has asked parliament to lift the immunity of José Barrionuevo, the former Interior Minister. Although the courts may never establish a link between Señor González and the illegal campaign, the Senate investigation will go straight to the heart of the matter — whether he was politically responsible.

Cornered by the "dirty war" accusations and by corruption scandals, the Prime Minister has lost the support of his former Catalan allies and has been forced to promise to hold elections next March, a year early. The opposition is too fragmented to call a vote of no confidence, but emphasised its demand for Señor González's resignation by rejecting his 1996 budget.

☐ Legal overhaul: The Spanish parliament approved yesterday the first complete overhaul of criminal law in more than a century. It voted in a penal code that cracks down on corruption and introduces laws prohibiting racism and sexual harassment. (AP)

Bonn toughens single currency terms for Paris

From Roger Boyes in Bonn and Charles Bremner in Brussels

THE German Chancellor, Helmut Kohl, swept aside his critics on European monetary union yesterday and said that a single currency was impossible without French participation. "To suggest otherwise would be false," he said.

The Bundestag budget debate, hectoring and often ill-tempered, did little to clear up the German confusion about the fate of their mark because Herr Kohl refused to discuss details of the entry timetable. The semi-official view in Bonn is that the new French Government is a useful step towards meeting the EMU convergence criteria by 1998.

Theo Waigel, the Finance Minister, however, seems to be making it more and more difficult for the French to meet any of the targets. On Tuesday he proposed a "European stability council" to monitor financial discipline after EMU entry. A "stability pact" would supplement the Maastricht treaty and would ensure that member states' deficits would stay below 3 per cent of gross domestic product.

In Brussels last night German attempts to toughen the terms for monetary union earned a reproach from the European Commission as pro-EMU officials tried to quell talk of delaying the project into the next century. The Commission, which is nursing the EMU project towards birth, said it welcomed German calls for sound economic management, but there could be "no question of adding new conditions".

It became plain during the Bundestag debate that Herr Kohl has put a muzzle on any public talk of delaying EMU or even using the well-worn phrase "meeting the convergence criteria is more important than the timetable". The phrase, used by politicians across the spectrum, suggests a readiness to see a delay in the start date. Herr Kohl evidently believes that open talk of flexible timetables will undermine the will of the new French Government to press ahead with reducing its borrowing and its debt burden.

Ministers and other politicians therefore emphasised yesterday the inviolability of Maastricht. "Whoever talks about new negotiations is in effect unravelling the treaty," Helmut Haussmann, the Free Democrat economics expert, said, suggesting that recent Social Democrat utterances did precisely that. "The deadline is part of the treaty and it is time we understood that," he added. If the Government followed some Social Democrat advice and waited for Spain, Italy and Greece to be ready for EMU, the Continent would be drawn into a whirlpool of nationalism accompanied by high unemployment and political extremism, Herr Haussmann said.

The Chancellor's plans may well be in favour of EMU delay. Certainly, that is the suggestion of Der Spiegel which quoted this week a senior Finance Ministry official as saying that Article 109 of the Maastricht treaty gives enough loopholes for postponement. But yesterday the Chancellor was saying little, entering the debate late and with a speech that concentrated on dismissing his critics. "As Chancellor, I would like to appeal to the Social Democrats to stop as soon as possible their unhelpful discussion."

Portuguese hail victory for art over £190m dam

Experts are overjoyed at the success in halting work on a dam that would have flooded more than 1,000 rock engravings of Ice Age animals, writes Edward Owen

The new Socialist Government yesterday delighted the archaeological community of Portugal with its decision to save the world's largest open-air site of Stone Age art by halting work on a £192 million hydro-electric dam.

Its waters would have flooded the recently discovered "sacred site" on the River Côa, a tributary of the Douro near the Spanish border in northeast Portugal.

The move by Antonio Guterres, the Prime Minister, as he announced his Government's programme on Tuesday, came after leading experts on rock art had pleaded with the Lisbon authorities to save the unexplored site and its 20,000-year-old engravings from certain destruction.

Scientists at Ipaar, the Portuguese heritage institute, were caught between their professional instincts and the politicians of the previous government. The centre-right Social Democrats had favoured the dam, now half built by the state electricity company, EDP, at a cost of £19 million. Yesterday the relief at Ipaar's offices in Lisbon was palpable. "We have never seen anything like the Côa site," said Marina Pignatelli, 26, an anthropologist with Ipaar.

"Since the first engravings were discovered a year ago, hundreds more have been found and it will take years to study the valley. The drawings are very beautiful with lots of aurochs (Ice Age oxen), deer, fish, horses, bulls and cows.

"We have also found one drawing beside the river, the size of the palm of a hand, of a man. He has a very big head and a very large penis. He has been called the 'Man of Pisco' and probably played a part in some rite. We cannot give exact dates for the drawings, but the stylistic method is similar to other findings in Europe. We call it a sacred site."

Senhorita Pignatelli says the Côa discovery represents the only open air Palaeolithic rock art in Portugal and ranks in importance with the cave paintings of Altamira in Spain, Lascaux in France, and Valcamonica in Italy. But the extent of the art is far greater, along 12 miles of the remote Côa valley. "It will undoubtedly help us study the evolution of man in Europe," she said.

She added: "It seems there was parallel evolution in different places. The Stone Age people depended on the same eco-systems, they were hunters and would follow animals wherever they went. We have found stone arrowheads, stone hammers and the remains of huts where they lived.

"Lots of the drawings are very fine and cannot be seen in daylight. But they can be seen better with artificial light at night. Local people probably knew of the engravings but they had never been studied by experts.

"The Government is now asking for an in-depth study on the creation of a park, so that the public can see the drawings. It could become a tourist attraction. But we will need international aid to complete the project."

The engravings, some two yards high, are close to the wide, shallow river. They depict oxen with curling horns, horses with bucket-shaped snouts and large goats. John Crisostomo, a Portuguese expert living in New Jersey, who has co-ordinated an international campaign to save the engravings, last night emphasised their importance and said that he hoped the Côa valley would become a World Heritage Site.

Major unmoved as thousands march against Pacific tests

FROM NICHOLAS WOOD, CHIEF POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT, IN AUCKLAND

JOHN MAJOR refused to give ground to thousands of anti-nuclear protesters as he arrived in Auckland yesterday to attend the Commonwealth conference.

As demonstrators prepared to take to the streets of the New Zealand city to voice their anger over British backing for French nuclear tests in the Pacific, the Prime Minister insisted he would not change his mind. "We are a nuclear weapons country. We don't have to test. We are not going to test. The French feel that they have to. That is a decision for France. It is for them to make, and I am not about to condemn them for doing so."

The Prime Minister said he understood the passions raised by the French programme on Mururoa Atoll, but made clear he would not be swayed by a campaign of vilification on the streets or pressure from leading Commonwealth politicians at the four-day conference starting tomorrow. He will make plain to the leaders, virtually all lined up against the French, that he will dissociate himself from any attempt in the communique to embarrass Paris.

Amid tight security in Auckland, Mr Major was expecting to run the gauntlet of two demonstrations today, only one of which has a police licence.

The Prime Minister's talks with Jim Bolger, the New Zealand Prime Minister and an outspoken critic of the tests, were taking place against the background of marchers heading for his city centre hotel. Yesterday 13 arrests were made in a demonstration against Mr Major involving about 200 people.

For the police, charged with protecting leading politicians from 52 countries, the greatest cause for concern was the Action Coalition demonstration, embracing not only anti-nuclear protesters but Sikh and Tamil activists, gay rights campaigners, Irish nationalists and militant republicans.

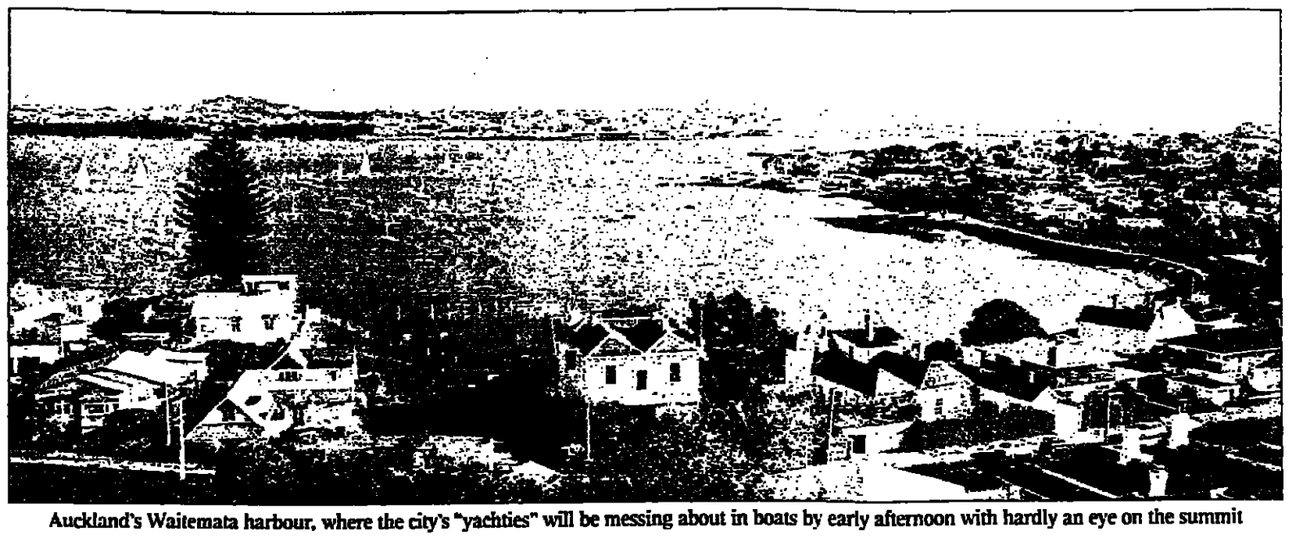

Peter Williams, the 61-year-old QC behind the "Major outrage rally", which was also heading for Mr Major's hotel, has likened the Prime Minister to Hitler.

Mr Major was said to be personally untroubled by the prospect of being the target of the protests. He said that Britain's aim was to secure a comprehensive test ban treaty next year. His officials pointed out that Britain, the United States and France had publicly commited themselves to creating a nuclear-free zone in the South Pacific.

A question-mark over the Commonwealth arose with the news that nearly a third of eligible members are staying away. Among 16 leaders likely to miss the summit are those from India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh.

Commonwealth officials cited "summit fatigue" from a concentration of recent gatherings, New Zealand's geographical remoteness, and domestic political difficulties.

Auckland's Waitemata harbour, where the city's "yachties" will be messing about in boats by early afternoon with hardly an eye on the summit

A city slightly more interesting than Luton

Auckland, site of the Commonwealth summit, may have sharpened its act, but for many New Zealanders it is still a 'playground for pansies', writes Jo Andrews

THERE is a moment on the final descent into Auckland airport, as you stare out at the grey clouds, flat green fields and the neat hedgerows, when you feel you might be landing at Luton.

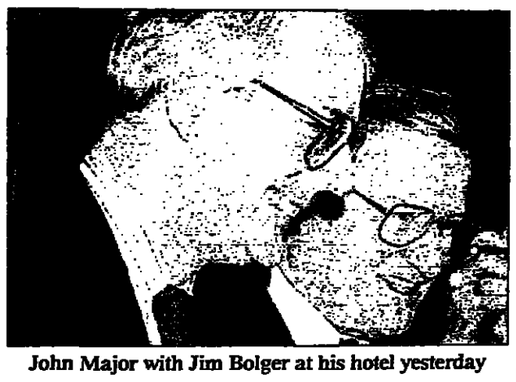

But John Major and other Commonwealth leaders should not imagine that Auckland is simply Britain with the clock turned back. It is no longer the home of hand-knits and cream teas.

Ten years of aggressive free-market policies and a wave of Polynesian and Asian immigration have almost succeeded in making Auckland interesting. It boasts some of the world's finest Sauvignons Blancs and excellent fish.

The streets are clean and relatively free of crime. The roads are the stuff that M25 motorists dream of: there are about ten miles of dual carriageway through and around the city: wheel clamps are still in the trial stage; the air is clear and you can swim in the harbour.

Auckland's main drawback is that it lacks a heart. The main street — Queen Street — resembles the average British suburban High Street. The Aotea Centre, where the Commonwealth leaders are to be corralled, has all the faults of the South Bank Centre with none of its towering barbarism.

But Auckland is not held in high esteem by most New Zealanders. The real New Zealander — who can be found propping up a bar wearing three days of stubble, shorts and a black singlet — believes Auckland to be a city of pansies in outrageous ties who have forsaken the one true religion — rugby — in favour of messing about in boats. If the streets of Auckland are eerily empty this week, it is because there are more boats per household in Auckland than in any other city in the world, and by 3 o'clock of the afternoon most "yachties" are making for the harbour to be in place for the infamous "Rum Race", held at five o'clock sharp. While the summit debates democracy in Africa and nuclear testing in the Pacific, Aucklanders will be pouring themselves a full glass of rum and enjoying yet another preview of the next America's Cup.

Death for dissidents widens Nigeria rift

BY NICHOLAS WOOD AND OUR FOREIGN STAFF

NIGERIA'S ruling military council yesterday confirmed death sentences on nine activists from the Ogoni minority area, including the writer Ken Saro-Wiwa, president of the Movement for the Survival of Ogoni Peoples.

All nine were found guilty last week by a tribunal of the murder of four pro-government chiefs in the volatile oil-producing area.

"We have gone through the papers in detail and we are completely satisfied with both the constitution of the tribunal, the outcome and the whole conduct of the tribunal," Brigadier-General Sam Malu said.

The death sentence passed on Mr Saro-Wiwa poses one of the biggest threats to Commonwealth unity.

Critics are demanding that leading figures, such as John Major and Nelson Mandela, who attends his first conference as President of South Africa, take the lead in expelling General Sani Abacha's regime.

British officials, however, indicated that they would not be taking up demands for the suspension of Nigeria, speaking instead of inserting "veiled teeth" into a summit communiqué intended to give substance to the 1991 Harare declaration on human rights.

Rachel Kelly meets a 49-year-old who went topless to champion the cause of older women

'I don't like taking my kit off on screen'

KIPPA MATTHEWS

Isla Blair: "My son has no problems watching the series because he knows it's not me"

Isla Blair is cross. Married, a mother, and a distinguished actress for 30 years, she has overnight become a household name for taking her kit off.

Last Sunday evening, in Andrew Davies's adaptation of The Final Cut on BBC1, we saw a topless Blair embracing her lover. The scene was immediately dubbed a steamy sex romp by the tabloids. Blair's embonpoint was blazoned under the headline "Isla bare". "The bosom is round and luscious. The nipples, rosy enough, are nearer to her nose than her toes," one wrote. Others have compared Blair to Farrah Fawcett, the former Charlie's Angel, who is baring all for the December issue of Playboy, and the singer Kiki Dee, who has stripped for the cover of her latest CD.

> 'We spent a lot of time shaking with laughter'

But stop. Blair is, of course, very different from others supposedly being naughty at 40. "I'm playing a character in the series. It's not Isla Blair up there, it's Claire Carlsen, an ambitious politician," she says. "My son has no problems watching the series because he knows it's not me. It's required as part of the production. Those scenes are as carefully choreographed as a sword fight."

She didn't relish the bedroom scenes. "I thought it was brave of me," she says. "I don't like taking my kit off on screen. I'm quite shy about my body. You expose a very intimate part of yourself."

So why did she agree to the role? "It's rare to find a script with a part as articulate, witty and stylish as Claire. In one scene I have seven minutes of dialogue with Ian Richardson, who plays the Prime Minister, Francis Urquhart, and it is pure mental chess. The dialogue attracted me."

As the four-part series unravels, she promises we will see other sides to Claire. "She is not just a ball-breaker but vulnerable and sensitive too," Blair says. And there is a point about championing the older woman. Claire strikes a blow for women in their forties — they, too, can fall in love, be ambitious, yet not be harridans. Blair thinks it is important to portray such women.

She says that during the bedroom scenes it helped that her co-star Paul Freeman, who plays the Foreign Secretary, Tom Makepeace, was unconcerned to seem macho. "We spent a lot of time shaking with laughter." But did she find him attractive? "Yes, but he is only the second most attractive man in England after my husband."

She has been married to fellow thespian Julian Glover for 26 years. Two years after leaving RADA, she played Fanny Burney in Boswell's The Life of Samuel Johnson to Glover's Boswell. They live in what she describes as "a grotty old 1930s semi" in Barnes, west London.

It is difficult to believe she has a 26-year-old son, Jamie, also an actor. She is proud that she is in such good trim, and her looks are certainly striking. She has deep-red hair, large eyes, high cheekbones and unlined skin. Her jacket is Armani, her boots Robert Clergerie, her scarf Georgina von Ertzdorf. "It's part of my job to be healthy and mobile," she says. Any time now she expects to start hormone replacement therapy.

Jamie is especially treasured as the child she thought she could never have. "We'd lived together for two years and nothing. Then we were married for a week, and I was pregnant. There's been nothing ever since, sadly, because I would have loved to have more children."

Blair was born in southern India of Scottish tea-planter parents and dispatched to boarding school in Scotland at the age of five. Perhaps because of this, she cherishes her own family. Jamie and Julian have always come first.

A precocious and talented teenager, Blair was pipped at the post at 16 for that year's RADA scholarship by the young Anthony Hopkins.

The producer, Murray Ferguson, who cast her in the Scottish series Advocates, says: "She is a quality actress and a delight to work with, having none of that star conceit that gets a bad press."

But, despite bit parts in films such as the first Beatles' film A Hard Day's Night, good parts in television series such as The Advocates, and her triumph opposite Richard Harris in Pirandello's Henry IV in the West End in 1991, she has yet to hit the theatrical or cinematic big time.

"I have a problem with my personality," she says. Unlike her screen persona, Claire Carlsen, Blair lacks ambition — and she votes Labour. While she likes seeing her name in lights, she is uncompromising. Time and again, if she is offered a part that clashes with family life, she refuses. "There is no decision to make. It sounds feeble, I know, but I've played a lot of wonderful parts."

Her greatest legacy, she says, will be her son and, she hopes, her grandchildren. "That's more of an achievement than any amount of credits and press clippings."

Where have all our oysters gone?

Giles Coren on the 100-year drought of the British mollusc

If you have ever wondered why oysters are so much more expensive in Britain than in France, so much scarcer now than in Victorian England, when they were a staple food of the poor, then you need look no further than the most famous mass slaughter in children's literature:

"O Oysters," said the Carpenter,
"You've had a pleasant run!
Shall we be trotting home again?"
But answer came there none.
And this was scarcely odd, because They'd eaten every one.

The gruesome fact behind the figures — Britain now produces only ten million oysters a year, compared with 2,000 million in France — is that, like Lewis Carroll's Walrus and Carpenter, we have eaten them all.

In 1850, Britain was probably producing 500 million oysters a year. The building of the railways and a growing population had contributed to an oyster boom, and on the streets of old London they were three a penny.

Dickens was an addict. His books are full of references to his favourite mollusc, and his visit to the United States in 1842 was celebrated with the consumption of 50,000 oysters at the "Boz Ball". Still not satisfied, he went "roystering and oystering" around New York.

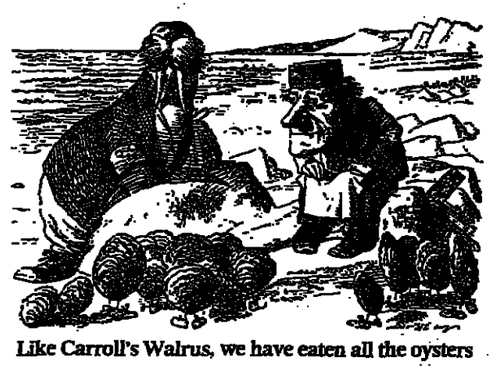

But, soon afterwards, Britain was hit by an oyster drought that has lasted ever since. According to a fascinating book by the retired economics professor, Robert Neild, of Trinity College, Cambridge, the famine has been a self-inflicted malaise. But not an incurable one.

"In the 1860s overfishing had led to a scarcity of oysters in both Britain and France," he says. "The French response was to impose restrictions on oyster fishing to allow stocks to recover. The British, tragically, took a different line.

"A Royal Commission on Sea Fisheries decided that the shortage was a natural phenomenon, and even recommended that oyster fishing could be increased."

The English, The French and The Oyster (Quiller Press, £18.50) charts the history of the British oyster, seeing it as a victim of laisser faire economic policy, which took the humble bivalve to the brink of extinction in 1900, by which time prices had risen ten times, and 100 million were imported annually from America.

"Having written books on the arms race and nuclear strategy, I decided that I might take a break," Professor Neild says. But despite chapters on the oyster in art (illustrated by wonderful colour plates), and on how to choose, open and eat them, the core of the book grows from Professor Neild's academic background.

Like Carroll's Walrus, we have eaten all the oysters

"The reason I started this was because I was fascinated to learn why the oyster population had declined. But it also became a way of showing the differences between the English and French.

"English policy is dominated by laisser faire, and government intervention comes only reluctantly to avert disaster, as with the great Winchester scandal of 1902, when four people were killed by poisonous oysters. Rather than dictating from the centre, British governments used local authorities and companies of fishmongers. It is the legacy of our democratic evolution, which has been a series of compromises, rather than a rational process.

"In France, everything has a hierarchy. There are strict rules for anyone wanting to start an oyster concession. In short, whereas things are government-driven in France, they are market-driven in Britain, which is fine. But it is clear which approach best suits oysters."

Professor Neild offers hope for a revival of British oyster production — not of the rare "native", known in France as belons — but of the cheaper and hardier "rock oyster". His book looks at the genesis of the aphrodisiac myth, rails at the use of condiments such as vinegar and suggests wines to accompany them (never champagne).

He also offers hope for the future. "One reason for oyster production staying down is their reputation for poisoning people. But EU regulations passed in 1993, ensuring that you are not sold oysters from dirty waters, mean that they are safer than they have been for years.

"I am no great epicurean," says the svelte professor, who is a member of the Oyster Group, an elite society which meets once a year to eat and discuss oysters. "I am much more interested in oysters than anything else."

If his book gets the audience it deserves, and the predicted revival occurs, he will not be alone for long.

Can drugs replace foetal implants? ☐ How cigarettes in the home put babies in danger ☐ Alcohol and the heart patient

Parkinson's and the prince

MEDICAL BRIEFING

Dr Thomas Stuttaford

NOTHING in Prince Michael of Kent's long career as an officer in the Royal Hussars will have prepared him for his task tonight — talking to doctors about C-terminal tetrapeptide of human B-endorphin of structure Lys-Lys-Gly-Glu, known familiarly as MPF, in the treatment of Parkinson's disease.

Tonight, the Prince is visiting the City of London where, in the presence of the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs, he will present a cheque to Dr Jack Morley, a neurophysiologist, and Mr John Miles, a neurosurgeon, of the University of Liverpool, to fund further research into MPF.

Prince Michael will be fulfilling the wish of the late Duchess of Beaufort that he should take over her role as patron of the medical charity Remedi, which is donating the research money.

Parkinson's disease is caused by the degeneration of part of the brain. Research has tended to concentrate on the use of foetal transplants of dopamine-secreting tissue into those parts of the patient's brain which have degenerated and are no longer producing adequate supplies of dopamine. The use of foetal tissue concerns some people on moral grounds and, unfortunately, the results have not been as successful as initially hoped. Dr Morley has achieved greater success in extensive animal studies with MPF, and its analogues, than with transplanted foetal tissue. The prospect that injections of a simple, cheap, naturally occurring chemical might replace foetal implants in the treatment of Parkinson's disease, thereby avoiding controversy on ethical issues and reducing the risk of infection and the problems which stem from the necessary immuno suppression, is an alluring one. After Dr Morley's success with animals, he has now recruited four human volunteers with advanced Parkinson's disease who are anxious to try the treatment. This therapy has been approved by the district ethics committee.

Parkinson's disease affects one person in 200. Although it is usually a degenerative disease in the elderly it is often forgotten that it can also strike in earlier life. About 1 per cent of people over 65 have evidence of the disease, whereas at the age of 40 fewer than one in 400 are affected. It can even appear in adolescents.

The diagnostic sign most readily noticed by the public is the slow shake, but there are also many other associated neurological problems. Muscle movements become slow, so slow that dressing, walking, swallowing, smiling and even talking may be difficult.

As the facial reactions to conversation become slower, patients gain an undeserved reputation for being intellectually, as well as physically, slow. However, the mask-like, expressionless face with its unblinking stare may conceal a brain still lively and active, and hide spirited emotions.

Standard treatment is with drugs, either those which compensate for the loss of the natural dopamine, such as levodopa, or the anti-cholinergic drugs. One of the secrets of successful treatment is to start medication early.

Smoke alarm

SINCE babies have been placed on their backs to sleep, cot death, or Sudden Infant Death Syndrome (SIDS), has plummeted. But in Britain cot death remains the main cause of death for babies in their first year of life.

There is no single cause, but a report in Pulse magazine describes a close link between parental smoking and cot death. Research by Professor Peter Fleming of the University of Bristol shows that the more a baby's parents smoke, the greater the likelihood of the child dying from SIDS. The risk to the baby persists even where the child has its own smoke-free room. Professor Fleming said that the dangerous chemicals released by smoking are more concentrated in babies than adults. Significantly, there has not been a cot death in a non-smoking household in Avon for the past four years.

Research published in the Journal of Clinical Pathology has demonstrated a link between cot death and babies whose noses harbour both staphylococci and enterobacteria. Seven out of 48 babies who died from SIDS had both organisms in their nose, but they were only found in one of the control group. Toxins from a mixture of the two bacteria were lethal when injected into chick embryos. It is suggested that the combined toxins may have a synergistic action.

Unit count

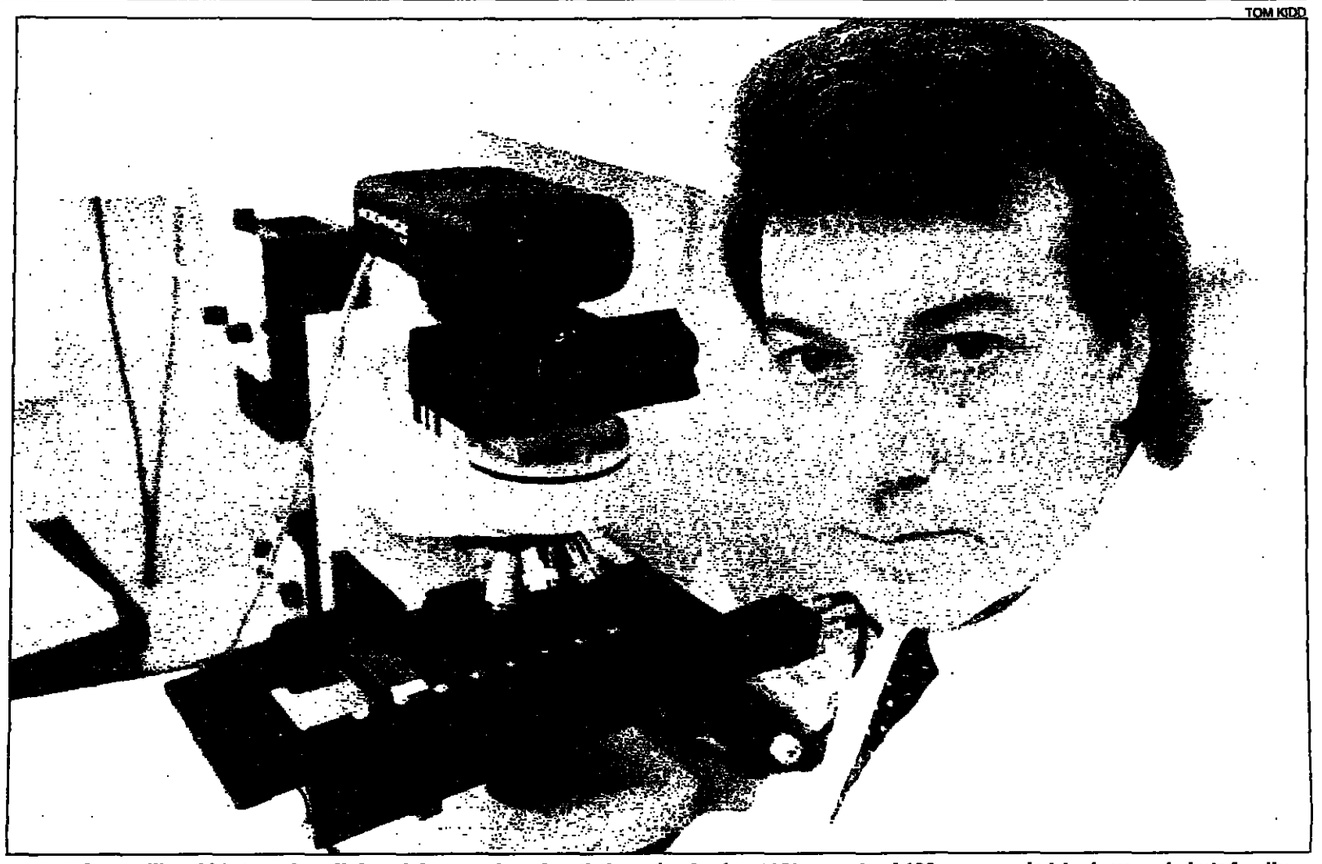

IT IS now accepted that alcohol in moderation has a beneficial effect on the heart. It is also recognised that red wines are better for the coronary arteries than white wines. There has, however, been some doubt as to the best advice to give a patient who has already had a coronary, or who has high blood pressure which is well controlled.

People with cardiovascular disease should not drink to excess, but President Yeltsin and anybody else who has recently had a heart attack should be pleased that a survey in Japan of the lifestyles of 895 patients who have had a heart attack found that they do better for a few drinks. Their report in the General Practitioner magazine showed that in the three and a half years since the coronary thrombosis, 13 per cent of those patients who drank 14 units of alcohol a week (two glasses of wine a day) had another attack, but 21 per cent of the teetotallers succumbed. Two glasses of wine a day might not be quite what Mr Yeltsin is used to but, as the Japanese doctors have shown, it is better than nothing.

The Journal of Hypertension also has good news for those who have been accustomed to a drink but who have high blood pressure which is now adequately treated. Over a 11-year period those who drank in moderation, in this case under 21 units a week (not more than three glasses of wine a day), had 40 per cent fewer strokes and 25 per cent fewer coronaries. Those who drank fewer than ten units a week did best.

The riddle of mad cow disease

Gillian Bowditch talks to the medical detective who is looking for clues to a bizarre brain disorder

TOM KIDD

Dr Robert Will and his team in Edinburgh have gathered statistics going back to 1970, examined 600 cases, and visited every victim's family

The haunting face of Stephen Churchill, the first teenager in Britain to die from the rare brain disorder Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease (CJD), has stared out from the news columns in the past month. In that time CJD was the subject of more than 60 stories in British newspapers (another teenager, as yet unnamed, has also been diagnosed in Britain), although just 55 people died of it here last year.

The reasons for the headlines are its one-in-a-million rarity, appalling and incurable symptoms — dementia and paralysis, leaving patients utterly helpless, and the alarming possibility that it could be transmitted to human beings from diseased cows.

The man charged with tracking the disease and studying every single reported case in this country is Dr Robert Will, a consultant neurologist who runs the CJD Surveillance Unit in the Western General Hospital in Edinburgh.

No one can be better qualified than Dr Will, who began studying CJD more than ten years ago and examined every known case that occurred between 1980 and 1984. The disease is one of a number of forms of spongiform encephalopathy, which include BSE ("mad cow" disease), scrapie (a spongy brain disease of sheep), and kuru, a disease which affected people on Papua New Guinea who ate the brains of their dead relatives.

Named after two German neurologists who separately discovered the disease in the early 1920s, CJD was, says Dr Will, "a dumping ground for obscure neurological disorders of an unknown nature for 40 years". Interest in CJD grew in the late 1960s when a vet made the association between kuru, CJD and scrapie. It was then discovered, by injecting animals with infected material, that CJD was a transmissible disease. Dr Will says this revelation in 1968 was astonishing.

> Victims' relatives are asked forty-four pages of questions

"There were all sorts of paradoxes. The question was where on earth was the infection coming from," he says.

The first case of "mad cow" disease, or BSE, was diagnosed in 1986, and as it became known that this could be transmitted to cows by sheep infected with scrapie, the question of whether the infected cows could transmit the disease to human beings was raised.

Clearly a study of all CJD cases in Britain was of utmost importance in case of an animal-human link, and Dr Will was the obvious choice to conduct the research. His team of 12 have gathered statistics going back to 1970, and examined 600 cases. A member of his team visits each victim's relatives with a 44-page questionnaire. Information is elicited on a quite extraordinary range of activities, from whether the deceased had ever been in contact with ferrets to whether he or she had pierced ears.

Despite all their work, which includes detailed comparison with other European countries, no evidence of a link between CJD and "mad cow" disease has been found so far. Because the incubation time of the disease can be very long (up to 30 years), another ten to 15 years of surveillance are needed.

"My expectation is that we will not find any definite link," he says. "I still believe that very firmly, but I do think it will be years before we can be sure. Proving a definite association is a very difficult thing to do with a rare disease unless there is a major change. We have not had a major change."

There have, however, been developments. The numbers have increased from 31 cases in 1990, when his study began, to 55 last year. Despite the two recent cases in teenagers most of the increase is in the over-75 age group, and Dr Will believes that this reflects improvements in identifying the disease rather than an increase in its incidence.

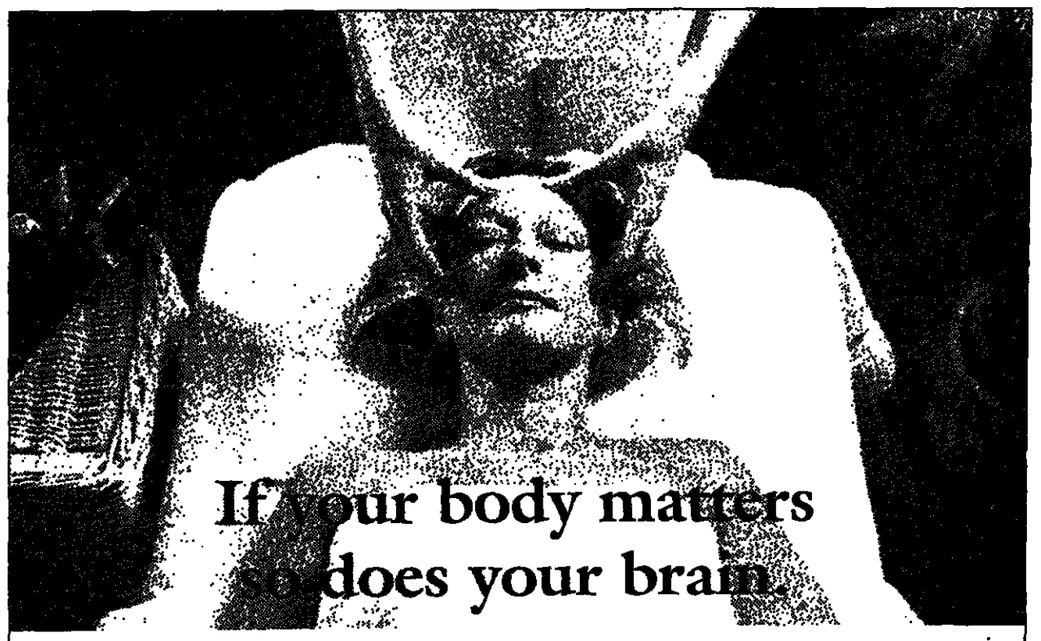

He has also studied the suggestion that there is a link with farming — four British farmers have died from the disease, and a fifth case is possible. While this is a matter of concern, Dr Will points out that victims have come from a wide range of occupations, including professional drivers and vicars.

Some meats have been implicated, ranging from black pudding and veal to venison. But information about the diet of the victims has to be collected from relatives, whose memories may be faulty, and who may be subconsciously biased by scare stories about meat. Although the links with venison and veal are statistically significant, Dr Will thinks they are unlikely to be meaningful. "I still enjoy beef," he says, pointing out that there have been several cases of lifelong vegetarians contracting CJD. Findings from a European study which are due out next year may shed more light on potential dietary associations.

Dr Will emphasises the importance of collaborating with other European countries, where "mad cow" disease is virtually unknown. If BSE were responsible for the increase in CJD victims, we would expect an increased incidence in Britain. Studies identical to Dr Will's, using the same questionnaire and techniques, have been set up in a dozen other countries. So far the findings are that the incidence of CJD in Britain and in the rest of Europe is very similar, about one in a million.

"What we do know is that cases of teenagers have been described elsewhere which cannot be related to BSE. There have been two in America, one in France and one in Poland. So there is a precedent for teenagers getting CJD," he says.

How Ginkyo tablets could help maintain the brain's blood supply.

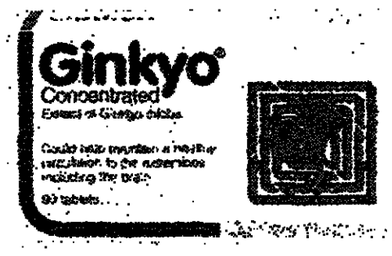

Recent research indicates that Ginkyo tablets could help maintain peripheral circulation and in particular the blood flow to the brain. The blood carries oxygen and nutrients, such as glucose, which are needed for normal functions like memory and concentration.

■ When being disadvantaged is an advantage, it is time to change the welfare culture

The term "dependency culture" used to be a right-wing shibboleth. Labour politicians over the past 20 years took turns to hiss at this outrageous slur on the "most vulnerable sections of our society". Reform of the welfare state — which is to say, cutting it back — was nothing less than an attack on the poor. All that hyperbole, so happily bandied about when Labour was in no danger of getting back into office, will come back to haunt its present front bench. For Labour must now point out the virtues of all those arguments that it has demonised for a generation.

As the Shadow Home Secretary, Jack Straw, said on this page yesterday, welfare dependency is the enemy of vibrant community life. His colleague, Frank Field, has gone even further. He has acknowledged what American research has shown: that a comprehensive welfare state encourages and maintains the worst kind of poverty: the sort that destroys any impulse to escape from it. Welfare-driven poverty, unlike the kind that results from random calamities within a market economy, is a system of bribes which entices people to behave irresponsibly. And it is an offer which the truly vulnerable are in no position to refuse.

> Welfare is a system of bribes promoting fecklessness

The reason for this is devastatingly simple. Welfare payments can either be universal, like child benefit, or selective, going only to those "in need". Since it would impoverish any country to offer universal benefits high enough to transform the condition of the needy, the only solution to poverty has been seen to be "targeted" benefits. To avoid squandering taxpayers' money by giving handouts to the rich, cut-off points for eligibility are established.

There has always been intense political pressure from the Left to guarantee that no one who suffers the disadvantage of unemployment or poor life-chances should be cast into notably worse circumstances than their more fortunate peers. So the value of their benefits package had to keep pace with reasonably normal expectations of a decent life.

Even Peter Lilley, in his current tug-of-war with William Waldegrave, wishes to freeze lone-parent benefit rather than abolish it, although there are more two-parent families in poverty than single parents. His latest plans — already attacked by the Opposition with full-blooded old Labour rhetoric — would barely dent the housing benefit racket which has helped to raise private rents beyond the reach of the working poor.

No one now denies the appalling crisis to which this has led. Benefit dependency traps people in their own defeat. It creates social ghettoes, in which work is an untenable option, carrying with it only the threat of the withdrawal of benefits. The working poor are clobbered by the tax system to pay benefits to those who see, quite rightly, that the most sensible course for survival lies in the advantages attached to being disadvantaged. What is even more depressing is that the dependency culture now extends wider than the stereotypical "sink" council estate. People who would once have been independent, self-respecting providers for the future are being inducted into its ranks.

In a paper published today by John Redwood's Conservative 2000 Foundation, the Tory backbencher Julian Brazier presents indisputable evidence of the effects of one such attempt to "target" welfare spending. What he calls "punishing the frugal elderly" began in 1988, when changes were brought in which introduced a new means-tested supplementary pension and a capital rule on housing benefit. What this meant was that pensioners' savings (not their actual income, as previously) could disqualify them from housing benefit. So, being rational creatures, thousands of pensioners are dumping their savings — which are, after all, finite — rather than lose their claim to housing benefit, which they can assume will continue for the rest of their lives.

As Mr Brazier shows, the number of pensioner households on income support, which had been steadily falling until 1988, has now started to rise. More of the retired are now claiming extra welfare benefit, even though the number on occupational pensions has dramatically increased. If you make it worth their while, even the prudent will pauperise themselves.

And at the other end of the life cycle, we have sought to deliver lone-parent families from economic disadvantage. So we offer a welfare package which invites working-class girls to have children outside marriage. Like their elders, the young prefer official poverty, with its relative security, to the far riskier and more difficult business of waiting and planning and aspiring. And for all this, the working two-parent family pays with its taxes — and the lower its earnings, the more, proportionally, it pays.

Will Labour put its policies where its new mouth is and offer poor working families a marriage tax allowance and child tax allowances to lift them out of their genuine disadvantage? We shall see.

GULF WAR HERO SYNDROME

The Queen's growth area

We ignore the opportunities of Commonwealth at our peril

William Rees-Mogg

In the 1950s, Britain made a bad mistake. We failed to recognise the economic and political development of Europe, and as a result joined the European Community 15 years later than we might have done, and on less satisfactory terms. The whole of our relationship with Europe has been damaged by that blunder. We did not foresee that there would be an exceptional opportunity to expand British trade with Europe, which was at that point one of the most rapidly growing economic regions. Britain was held back partly by a sentimental attachment to the Commonwealth, which was at that time a relatively disappointing area in economic terms, and was separating itself as the Empire became independent. In the 1950s there was still a nostalgia for the Empire as it had once been.

In the 1990s, Britain shows every sign of making the opposite mistake. The European Union has become a high cost, high tax, high unemployment, low growth area, falling behind the United States in advanced technology, and far behind Asia in labour costs and economic growth. It is now the Commonwealth, with which Britain still enjoys a unique historic connection, which is the faster growing economic area. Beyond the Commonwealth there is an even faster growing group of Asian countries, for which the Asian Commonwealth countries provide an ideal geographical and trade link.

The table below shows the contrast. If one takes 3.5 per cent long-term growth of real GDP as the lower limit for a high growth economy — such an economy would double in size every 20 years — there are eight high growth Commonwealth countries, with a combined population of 1,271 million. There will still be seven of them when Hong Kong rejoins China. There are six Asian countries outside the Commonwealth, with a combined population of 1,577 million. These 2,848 million comprise the expanding world market on which Britain should primarily be concentrating. And against that there are only three high growth European countries (Ireland, Spain and Portugal, with a combined population of 52.4 million) and two American (Chile and Colombia, with a population of 47 million). The European Union and the American high growth economies only add up to 3.5 per cent of the population of the high growth economies of the Commonwealth and Asia. No economist would argue that Ireland, Spain, Portugal, Chile and Colombia represent Britain's best trading future. Without the cocaine business, Colombia would not even be in the high growth list.

No doubt these comparisons are less than fair to some countries. The economic growth in any arbitrarily chosen period may not be repeated in the next — or it may be surpassed. The Economist ended the chosen period in 1992 because that is the last year for which fully comparable figures are available. Some countries — including Britain — might be favoured by a different period, starting earlier or ended later. Perhaps South America is moving closer to the Asia growth pattern, as some investors believe. Certainly a more up-to-date figure would be much less flattering to Japan, which has not done well in the 1990s.

But whatever the qualifications, the contrast is so great that they make little difference. The high growth markets of the Commonwealth and Asia are nearly 30 times as populous as those of the European Union and the American continent. The high growth markets of the Commonwealth alone are 25 times as large as those of the European Union, though they are not yet as rich.

The immediate outlook is that these Commonwealth and Asian economies will continue to expand even faster relative to Europe or North America. Until they reach the stage of Japan, when their costs will have risen to the European or North American level, they are likely to continue growing much faster than Europe or North America. This is a process of catching up through the transfer of technology. Many of these countries will not have caught up, even approximately, until the second quarter of the next century, and some of them will take even longer than that. The pattern of growth indicated in the table can be expected to continue for another 30 to 50 years, and has already been established for 15.

There is no secret about the rise of Asia, or the lack of competitiveness of Europe. What is extraordinary is that everyone does not recognise these facts. Both the Conservative Government and the Opposition remain almost completely Euro-centric in their trade policy, and the Opposition is the worse of the two. Neither party pays more than lip-service to the Commonwealth, or seems to have any idea of its potential. The only leading British figure who has consistently worked hard for the Commonwealth is the Queen. The bizarre truth is that the Queen has shown a much better grasp of current trends in world trade than any of her ministers or anyone on the Opposition front bench. Instead of an independent Bank of England, perhaps the Governor ought to be made directly answerable to the Crown.

Little or nothing will be done to correct this neglect of Commonwealth opportunities in the New Zealand Conference of Commonwealth prime ministers. Reports from Wellington already suggest that the conference will be concerned largely with secondary issues; Britain will be supporting the French nuclear tests in order to demonstrate that we are "good Europeans". It would be better if we were more concerned to protect the Pacific and world environment. Malcolm Rifkind's recent speeches suggest that he is reconsidering the priorities, but the solid institutional weight of the Foreign Office is still as exaggeratedly Europeanist now as it was exaggeratedly suspicious of Europe in the 1950s.

Britain's failure to maximise the Commonwealth advantage is not even good for Europe. We ought to be going to next year's inter-governmental conference with the failure of European competitiveness as our main theme. If the European Union is to prosper or even survive, the European countries must come to terms with the growth of Asia. From Hong Kong or Singapore this is quite obvious; it is by now a truism. Yet in continental Europe that truth is hardly perceived. The French do not understand it, nor do the Italians. Some German industrialists do, and they are building new factories in Asia, but the German Government does not, and the German people do not see it at all. Brussels itself is utterly complacent, and a negative force of great influence.

In the 1950s, far-sighted people in Britain thought that the old Empire was crashing around their ears, as it was, and that Europe was the best base to build Britain's future. Those of us who were young in the 1950s were often infuriated by the 1930s attitudes of the politicians and civil servants then in power. Unfortunately, Europe then became the idée fixe of at least two generations of the British political class, as it still is. Now that the Commonwealth is growing far more rapidly than the European Union, and is more important to Britain's trading future, the blind old men are all good Europeans. We got it wrong once, and we seem determined to get it wrong again. We can be thankful that the Queen has always had more sense of the Commonwealth than her governments.

Tyranny of the Middle

Matthew Parris on Blair's betrayal of society's fringes

At least Clare Short is human. Prick her and she will bleed. Prick Tony Blair these days and you may hear only the hiss of escaping refrigerant gas. Last week humanoid zapped human, and I found the kill depressing. The spectacle was staged for Middle England, for whose approval the parties are now battling. This battle is starting to impoverish British democracy.

"Impoverish?" you ask. Surely when a party seeks centre ground it seeks the heart of the nation? Surely by coming in from the fringes to engage with the hopes and fears of those in the middle, politicians act as democrats? Isn't new Labour more "democratic" now? I suppose this is plausible, if you assume the spirit of a nation is located in its middle.

But is it? And in training yourself exclusively to its service, what other spirits do you crush? To bend every political endeavour to the seduction of one group is to create a tyranny of the centre. Numerous though we of Middle England are, we are a minority of the whole population. To think and act as though our minority — because it "holds the balance" — should be judge and jury of Labour's whole project, is to offer disproportionate influence to a single group. It is undemocratic in the same way as letting a minority party swing the balance of a coalition government.

I like Middle England. My own origins are there. I enjoy the Daily Mail. I agree that the bourgeoisie compose many vertebrae in the backbone of our nation, and politicians ignore us at their peril. But we are not the whole repository of the nation's wisdom, and we are not the sole guardians of its virtue; and we should not be encouraged to think so: it is bad for us.

It is not good for Britain either. A tax structure organised around the avarice and envy only of Middle England, a strategy for employment and the economy catering to Middle England's pathological horror of financial insecurity, a police and jurisprudence groomed to reflect Middle England's moral prejudices, an arts and educational philosophy reflecting Middle England's values and tastes, welfare attitudes attuned to Middle England's insensitivities and an election team commanded to seek out and serve Middle England's daily and shifting petulances . . . such imperatives may win "key" groups of floating voters, but they lose you something too: friends you may one day need, and that greatest of intangibles, self-respect.

Soul by soul and silently the bounds of those citizens in whom the Labour Party is not interested are increasing.

Look individually at each marginal group and it is easy to understand the contempt with which the Blair-Mandelson axis dismisses each. Squeegee merchants? Not many of them: a few thousand mean-faced youths. The homeless? "No votes in it," the Labour leader is alleged to have snapped at a deputation tugging his sleeve. Our citizens in Hong Kong, awaiting delivery into the hands of the world's greatest tyranny? No votes there.

Single mums in council flats? Why harken to them? They're hardly likely to vote Tory. A slyly crafted disparagement or two, slipped into the popular press, will draw many an approving murmur over the Silver Shred in Basingstoke.

People with a grudge against the police? Hardly. The problem with police attitudes doesn't often cross doorsteps where the Daily Mail is delivered and the doorbell sounds that two-tone electronic chime that ought to be Labour's theme tune. Ding-dong. It's Mr Straw, come to tell you Labour supports the police. Hooray. Noisy neighbours? Who's in favour of noisy neighbours? Gypsies, ravers, travellers, beggars? They don't vote and nobody likes them. Cannabis-smokers? Are you crazy, Clare? Since when was there a dopeheads' vote to be courted?

No, it's a ragged army, I concede. Though perhaps in sum a little more numerous than, from Mr Blair's Ski-yoghurt-centred world, it may look. But if that story about the irritated dismissal of a deputation of sleeve-tuggers for the homeless is true, then two groups, not just the homeless themselves, were dismissed: for the sleeve-tuggers were what (if we sought to dismiss them) we could call "celebs". The kind of people who write as joint signatories to the letters page of The Guardian. Less dismissively, I would say they represented what we might call the cultured, the "privileged", the intellectual conscience of the Labour Party, whose roots go deeper than "new" Labour may care to remember. They, too, are not very numerous. But in a few years, when Mr Blair has joined the late Harold Wilson in the ranks of the century's most loathed prime ministers, new Labour may miss their civilising support not so much for its numbers as for the blank its departure leaves in the party's soul.

On Friday the Nutra-Sweeting of Labour achieved a new benchmark. Tony Blair appeared on morning television with Richard and Judy, and told them, twice, that he went to church. Sieg Silver Shred. Sieg Melody FM. Chambourcy Heil.

Ritz refits

THE RITZ HOTEL in London, which was bought for £75 million last month by the reclusive Barclay brothers, has appointed a new manager: Tom O'Connell, a dry-humoured, diminutive Irishman.

The previous incumbent, Brian Williams, who arrived to take the job from Hong Kong only a year ago and has just bought a large family house in Putney, has returned to the Far East. He has been forced to rent out the house.

The new Barclay broom at the London institution, where decadence reached new heights in the 1950s when the ageing American actress Tallulah Bankhead slurped champagne from a high-heeled shoe, is being keenly felt.

O'Connell, who will earn up to £100,000 a year in his new post, said yesterday that refurbishment is planned in the new year. "The money is there, and we are hoping first of all to restore the hotel to its glory," he said. "Then we will look at other possible improvements. But the hotel will not close." There are also suggestions that the Barclay twins have been snooping around a neighbouring building with a view to expansion.

One of the earliest manifestations of the new regime will be the New Year's Eve party at the Ritz, which O'Connell has revamped. "Tom is a great one for his New Year's parties," explains a friend. "His glasses tend to fog up."

Tallulah: well-heeled

● David Hockney, an unrepentant smoker appalled by the American craze for banning cigarettes, kept popping outside for a gasper on the opening night of his retrospective exhibiton at the Royal Academy on Tuesday night. Smoking, he explained between puffs, is not allowed in the gallery.

LORD TEBBIT made a quick exit yesterday from the People of the Year awards, in which the late mountaineer Alison Hargreaves was among the winners. As he mucked in with the likes of the Princess Royal and Trevor McDonald at the Park Lane Hilton, Tebbit suddenly clasped his jaw and mumbled that he had broken a tooth.

Suitable boy

ROY HATTERSLEY didn't cut his usual sartorial dash at the Foyle's lunch to celebrate publication of his autobiography, Who Goes Home?, at the Grosvenor House Hotel on Park Lane yesterday. As he swapped yarns with old Labour swingers such as Lords Callaghan and Healey and Michael Foot, his manly chest seemed to be bursting (with pride, obviously) out of an ill-fitting jacket. So he told his story of the day he sat next to the boss of Aquascutum at a dinner.

"I told him I was going to refer in my speech to the fact that I bought my suits from Aquascutum. He said that was fine but asked if I would make it clear that the suit I was wearing that day was not one of theirs."

My ward

THE PRINCE of Wales adopted the sympathetic bedside manner of his wife yesterday. He popped in to London's Royal Free Hospital for a private visit to his friend Sir Robert Stephens, who is still recovering after a liver and kidney transplant last year.

The Prince turned up with Sir Robert's son Toby, and the three keen Shakespeareans reminisced about their Prince's Choice compilation. Apparently, they re-enacted the tavern scene from Henry IV.

Shin up

WIMBLEDON has Vinnie Jones, but in Italy they have an ankle-biting Brazilian who plays for Cagliari. Luis Airton Oliveira was caught in a recent match against AC Milan lying on the ground gripping the leg of an opposing midfielder, Dejan Savicevic, and biting in a fevered manner on his ankle.

Savicevic says that Oliveira, who scored twice during Cagliari's 3-2 league defeat, had a wild look in his eyes after the incident on Sunday. "I thought, better steer clear of this one because he still wants to chew on my leg," he said.

● After fears that Frank Johnson may not last as Editor of The Spectator, another recent appointee is in trouble. Alexander Chancellor is no longer Editor of The Sunday Telegraph Magazine. Perhaps he dared to be a little too dull?

Write off

JUST AS the extra-curricular activities of MPs are being curbed, so are those of BBC journalists. The extraordinary productivity of staffers such as John Simpson, the foreign affairs editor who now writes for The Sunday Telegraph and used to contribute to The Spectator, seems to have caught a busybody's eye.

"We have re-examined our policy, and after consultation we have drawn up a list of examples, which is in the process of being organised," said a drawling BBC representative. Difficult to know what he means, but insiders say it's a crackdown.

DAY NOVEMBER 9 1995

Tyranny of the Middle

Matthew Parris on Blair's betrayal of

A

POWELL'S CHOICE

The General puts peace before presidency

Yesterday morning Colin Powell was like a contestant in some fiendish American game show. He was on stage in front of an audience of millions. Before him were two boxes, Box A and Box B, from which he had to choose his future. If he chose Box A, he could live out his life as a respected war hero, bestselling author and role model for black America, with his wife and family in prosperous peace around him. If he chose Box B, he could run for President, watch his record be torn apart by political opponents, watch his privacy disintegrate before the press and risk an assassin's bullet.

Yesterday evening, he chose the first box. He disregarded opinion polls that predicted he could win. He left a gaping hole in the Republican campaign to win back the White House. He also disappointed tens of thousands of supporters, particularly those in Washington who never understood how politics could come second to privacy, respect and family feelings.

There were always question marks over whether the gilded General, grown to a life of order and deference, was tough enough to endure a presidential campaign. How would he respond to a reopening of his role in the My Lai massacre aftermath or the Iran-Contra affair? How would he deal with African-American groups who saw him as a Jamaican Uncle Tom, even worse than the white man?

There were questions too, as our Washington correspondent has reported in recent weeks, about whether his wife would endure a presidential campaign. For pundits and political scientists it was a matter of endless fascination how a black Republican would perform in a national poll. For Mrs Powell, this question seems to have been, quite understandably, a good deal less fascinating. Now, it may never be answered.

During his months of shadow-campaigning General Powell did not want for support. Prominent conservatives, including former Republican Cabinet members Jack Kemp and William Bennett, were protecting him against fundamentalist Christian groups who distrusted his social liberalism. Newt Gingrich, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and America's most powerful contemporary conservative, suggested that he could work with a Powell presidency.

On the Democratic side, General Powell was a nightmare coming true. If the General had chosen Box B, and battled his way through the Republican nomination battle, then President Clinton, in the words of one of his strongest supporters, was "chicken liver": his only chance of remaining on Pennsylvania Avenue would be to be eaten by the White House cat. Opinion polls showed Mr Clinton trailing General Powell by more than ten percentage points.

Now, however, the President's hopes are transformed. Only two Democrats since the Civil War have won consecutive presidential elections. Mr Clinton can dream again of following Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt into his party's Hall of Fame. A key part of his campaign will be to portray the Republican Party as too extreme for Colin Powell to feel happy inside.

Over the coming months, Mr Clinton will continue to enjoy the rare luxury of being unopposed from within his own party. Meanwhile Republican challengers must scrap their way across New Hampshire, seeking the early primary victory that provides momentum and money for the next phase of battle. Robert Dole is the Republican front-runner and likely to remain so. Mr Dole is the man whom Mr Clinton, despite all his Washington problems, is confident of defeating. The pressure is now on Mr Gingrich himself, the hero of the Republican revival. But 70 per cent of Americans say that they do not want President Gingrich. His "negatives", as the pollsters describe unpopularity, are impossibly high.

Meanwhile there will be disappointment across America that General Powell has chosen the security of Box A instead of Box B's baggage of risk. The notion of a black Eisenhower, riding back to save the political establishment from itself, had resonance beyond nostalgia. It represented a possible answer, however evanescent, however wishful the thinking, to questions of race to which there otherwise seem often no answers at all.

THE DEVIL IN THE DIESEL

What used to be thought virtuous is proving a villain

The diesel engine, so recently portrayed as a virtuous alternative for the public-spirited motorist, has turned out to be no better than its higher-octane cousin. The claim that the diesel would save the environment and reduce the risk of global warming has been replaced by the suggestion that its exhausts are contributing to 10,000 extra deaths a year. For black, read white; for hero, villain. In the politics of the environment, such abrupt transformations are nothing new.

The trouble with diesel engines turns out to be what humble observers, without a scientific degree between them, always suspected it might be: the clouds of smoke that they emit. Modern diesels, true, produce very little visible smoke compared with older buses and trucks, but that is because the particles comprising the exhaust are so small.

Fine particles advertise their presence less obviously, but have a far greater capacity to penetrate deep into the lung. Epidemiological studies, largely in the United States, indicate that these particles aggravate chest infections, heart disease and asthma. Two expert committees yesterday recommended tougher standards for particulates and the Government announced that it was accepting their advice.

This was the same Government which in the 1992 Budget introduced incentives to encourage diesel use. Can circumstances really have changed so dramatically since then? In 1992 the first evidence that diesel exhausts were harmful was beginning to emerge, but had yet to win the official imprimatur. Given the past record, how sure can we be that we are addressing the 3real problem, or that if the standards are achieved, the result will be healthier cities?

Many uncertainties remain. Although the proposals will give Britain the most rigorous air quality regulations in the world, there is no guarantee that this will be enough. Each step designed to sanitise the car by technological means risks being overtaken by the sheer weight of numbers, or by new science that shows that the problems solved were not the ones that really mattered.

Such doubts apart, the Government is clearly right to propose action. It believes that changes already under way will reduce particulate emissions by half over the next ten years, and that new powers to be given to local authorities will help by controlling traffic in pollution blackspots. Manufacturers are developing particulate traps, which could make a big difference, while the adoption of cleaner diesel fuel should be encouraged by tax incentives.

The ingenuity of the engineers should not be underestimated: a new car today is 20 times cleaner than one produced even a decade ago. Ultimately, however, there must be a limit to the growth of car journeys in town, many so short that the engine is never properly warm and the catalyst works inefficiently. Civilised cities need good public transport as well as strict air quality standards. The car has been indulged too long, and now we are paying the price.

STONE AGE SENSE

All Europeans can rejoice at the reprieve of Portugal's art

A change of government can sometimes break a deadlock from which there otherwise seems to be no escape. Thanks to dedicated campaigners inside and outside Portugal, Senhor Antonio Guterres's new Government in Lisbon has suspended work on a dam which threatened to submerge and probably destroy the world's largest collection of Stone Age engravings. The decision is a wise and sensitive response to the justified international concern which arose when The Times brought the archaeological emergency to wider international attention earlier this year.

Much of Europe's most vulnerable common heritage lies in the Continent's least developed regions. Northern Portugal alone contains several little-known prehistoric sites of enormous importance. Foz Côa, a 14-mile valley containing around 1,000 engravings of Ice Age animals, is one of the most recently discovered. The crude pictures may change our way of thinking about "cave men", suggesting to some scholars that the people who lived in southern Europe 20,000 years ago may have lived more in the open air than in cave shelters. It would be difficult to imagine a better cause for the concern which should cross borders. Second-rate works of art or ancient sites can sometimes be too glibly claimed as part of Europe's "common heritage", but for once the label fits the fact.

Having been brought to wider attention, the issue divided the parties in Portugal's recent general election which saw the (right of centre) Social Democrats replaced by the Socialists. The state electricity company developing the dam argued that the project created jobs and that the engravings could be protected against water. But the decision to flood the valley was taken hastily, with no real investigation of implications, alternatives or international evidence. Archaeologists argued that irreplaceable treasures would be lost for all time. To its credit, the new Government took the long and imaginative view that the debate went wider than the valley of Foz Côa and has commissioned a full study of the engravings and the best methods of protecting them.

The universities and agencies such as Unesco which have pleaded for the preservation of the Foz Côa site should now look to see whether they can provide financial help for the study and subsequent opening of the site. In the end, the Government in Lisbon may be able to have it both ways. Lay and expert visitors to Foz Côa over the coming years may generate more jobs in the region's underdeveloped tourist industry than a dam which, once built, requires little labour. Portugal's new leadership will have shown that its interests are not confined to local economic questions and that it listens sympathetically to voices from elsewhere in Europe. Above all, a precious piece of the past will have been saved for the future.

Differences of opinion about British Empire's benefits

From Professor David Day

Sir, The imperial triumphalism of Robert Rhodes James ("Now that the sun has gone down", November 3) is a tired repetition of an oft-repeated myth. The history of European imperialism does not bear out his claimed contrast between British benevolence and the bestiality of Britain's imperial rivals.

When Captain James Cook sailed the Pacific he was determined not to act like the Spanish but still shot countless Maoris who dared to contest his passage. Moreover, his subsequent claiming of Australia in 1770 had consequences for the Aborigines no less dire than the arrival of the Spaniards had on the Aztecs.

While the Spanish justified their robbery of the land and treasure of the Aztecs by pointing to the religious salvation they brought the natives, the British justified their robbery of the land of the Aborigines by pointing to the salvation of European civilisation that would be bestowed upon the Aborigines. Both forms of salvation were proffered at the point of a pike or a gun.

The Aborigines of Australia, who numbered perhaps a million people in 1788, were reduced to just 60,000 by 1900. I doubt that there would be an Aborigine, or a Maori, or a Canadian Indian who would agree with Rhodes James that "the arrival of the civilised British was the best thing that ever happened".

Yours sincerely,

From Dr A. J. Stockwell

Sir, "Serious historians" appreciate "Britain's rule and contribution ... more than ever", says Sir Robert Rhodes James. The historian's job would not be worth doing if we could not engage from time to time in arguments about "good" and "bad", but reflections on Britain's imperial record have frequently been obfuscated by pretty low-level exchanges.

I believe that serious historians today are not obsessed with heroes and villains; they are not attempting to resurrect deeds that won the empire, nor are they in the business of drawing up league tables showing the moral worth of Europe's various empires overseas. The flourishing research of today's post-imperial scholars explores the dynamics, forms and effects of empire from many angles, including high policy and popular culture, economics and war, race and sex, religion and medicine.

In our multicultural universities courses on imperial history are attracting many students who, dissociated from the guilt, nostalgia, or resentments of their parents' generation, are concerned less to take sides than to understand what happened.

Yours faithfully,
A. J. STOCKWELL

From Dr N. J. Brailey

Sir, We may not all be completely happy with Robert Rhodes James's specific defence of the British Empire, but of its fundamental importance in human history and progress there can be no doubt.

If the Roman Empire essentially created the Western world, so the British Empire in large measure, and more than anything else, created our modern global world. The sad (and mad) thing is that, with the passing of the wartime generation, how many people in the West in general, and in Britain in particular, now wish to retreat from the nascent internationalism that it represented into "Fortress North Atlantic", "Fortress Europe", or even "Little England".

That the UN cannot be entirely dispensed with is perhaps generally accepted, but the vastly more interdependent character of our late 20th-century globe, substantially the product of British imperial expansion in the 18th and 19th centuries, must be accepted also.

Yours faithfully,
N. J. BRAILEY,

From Mr Michael Purcell

Sir, Robert Rhodes James is right to say that "Britain's rule and contribution are now more than ever appreciated by serious historians and thoughtful people in the former colonies and dominions ..."

The closing decades of the Empire were marked by highly constructive work by colonial servants with a real sense of service. This period of tutelage was indispensable for many of our colonial territories.

Indeed few events in our history become us better than their orderly and peaceful hand-back to their peoples, transformed as far as time and resources permitted into more or less viable modern states. Our finest colonial hour, we might say: we can all take well founded pride in what was achieved.

When I met President Museveni of Uganda in October 1992, on behalf of the Foreign Office, and mentioned to him that I had served as a colonial administrator in his home region of Western Uganda, he was delighted and invited me back to Uganda as his guest. I gratefully accepted and saw something of how our successors there are, as one put it, "struggling to carry on where you left off".

From Mr Alan Forward

Sir, In support of Sir Robert Rhodes James's article may I quote the words of Chief Anyaoku, Secretary-General of the Commonwealth, as recorded in an interview with Country Life (November 2, 1995): "the values and the practices that all countries inherited from this country are values that are worth spreading".

He welcomed the acceptance of Cameroon as a member of the Commonwealth and noted that Angola and Eritrea, as well as Mozambique, have expressed an interest in joining.

Yours sincerely,
ALAN FORWARD,

Uniting again to recall the fallen

From the Dean of Westminster and others

Sir, For the first time in almost fifty years, as a result of the Royal British Legion's campaign (report, October 31), the nation is being given the opportunity at 11am on Saturday, November 11, Armistice Day itself, to remember and reflect upon the sacrifice that so many people have made during this century and continue to make in defence of this country, and upon all the freedoms which we enjoy today.

The fiftieth-anniversary events this year have clearly shown the nation's pride in its past achievements and its willingness to pay tribute to those who made them possible, many of whom gave their lives. It is right that we should continue to remember them in a way that impinges on people's consciousness, so that the lessons of the past are not forgotten.

Support for a two-minute silence on November 11 has already been pledged from many sectors of society. We very much hope that the whole nation will unite for this brief moment of remembrance and reflection.

'A good war'

From Mr Andrew Sewell

Sir, Surely the time has come to abandon the phrase "he had a good war" (obituary of Sir Michael Higgs, November 8). I have always thought that it may be appropriate for a "spiv", but hardly for those who served in the Armed Forces, particularly if with credit and distinction.

Yours faithfully,
ANDREW SEWELL,
Bay House, Aldbourne, Wiltshire.

Anglo-Czech link

From Lord Holme of Cheltenham

Sir, In your obituary of Ernest Gellner (November 7) you mentioned the fact that he had received his early education at the English Grammar School in Prague. This school was closed by the Nazis on their arrival in Prague and, after reopening briefly after the war, was closed once again by the Communists.

Ernest Gellner had the most affectionate memories of his old school. It was no doubt for this reason that he played such an active role in establishing its successor, the English College in Prague, which opened in September 1994 and which is already playing a prominent role as a standard-bearer for the best of British education in the new Czech Republic.

The governors of the college have therefore decided it would be appropriate to establish an Ernest Gellner scholarship fund.

The fund will be devoted to assisting Czech students from the English College in Prague to attend universities in Britain and we hope it will be an enduring memorial to an exceptional scholar and the Anglo-Czech friendship which his life personified.

Yours faithfully,
RICHARD HOLME

Gift of life

From Dr Bruce Marsden

Sir, For my life since 1947 I am indebted not only to the Great Ormond Street Hospital but also to the author of Peter Pan, who dedicated its royalties to support that great hospital.

There is clearly a place for private and public funding of communal services (Mr Alan Millard's letter, November 3), but when the question of innovation arises there seems nowadays to be a too conservative attitude. What may seem to be too risky to the managerial mind may appear to be a reasonable risk to the specialist mind.

Judging on a sound basis the balance between risk and benefit is central to the discussion about the National Health Service in relation to new drugs and procedures.

Without the conviction of Sir Alan Moncrieff that streptomycin could be successful in the treatment of tuberculosis, and who had the courage and power to import that American product from Sweden, this letter could not have been written.

Yours sincerely,
BRUCE MARSDEN,

Bye, bye blackbird

From Mr Kenneth C. Elkins

Sir, I can echo Mrs Atkins's query about lack of birds (letter, November 4). Here on the North Downs I put out a nut-feeder, which is refilled at least twice a week. It has lain untouched for almost a month, whereas it is normally visited by blue tits, great tits, coal tits, nuthatches, greenfinches, and a magnificent pair of greater spotted woodpeckers, to say nothing of robins and dunnocks, which pick up the pieces from the ground.

I have never known anything like this before. There are large crops of acorns, beech nuts, berries and so on everywhere, so it cannot be starvation. I can only assume abundance is the answer, but you would expect to see some birds around in the neighbourhood.

Yours faithfully,
K. C. ELKINS,
7 Thornbury Court,
Salmons Lane, Whyteleafe, Surrey.

From Mr W. G. McPherson

Sir, Blackbirds seem to be scarcer here too. I blame the drought and lack of soft-surface food for the fledgelings. Greenfinches have done well, judging by the attendance at the nut-feeders.

The weather, again, probably, has provided an abundance of good-quality seeds all summer.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,
W. G. McPHERSON,

Proposals to extend social justice

From Sir Gordon Borrie, Chairman of the Commission on Social Justice

Sir, It was with surprise that I read the view of "one senior Labour source" that the report of the Commission on Social Justice is "good on analysis but poor on proposals" (report, November 6).

It was indeed the task of the commission to analyse the state of the UK 50 years after Beveridge, revealing the massive inefficiency of relying so heavily on means-testing, concentrated long-term unemployment and a level of child poverty unthinkable twenty years ago. But there are also radical policy proposals to extend social justice and economic opportunity.

Among these are universal nursery education (which could be paid for by phasing out the married couples allowance, leaving resources to increase child benefit as well); an attack on the duration of unemployment through a new jobs, education and training (Jet) programme; and universal second pensions, funded by compulsory contributions from every employee and employer, with state credits paid for those not in paid work.

In addition, a modernised social insurance system would combine with a more flexible benefits system to build bridges back to employment.

Our recommendations should be refined and adjusted as policy-thinking continues, but it is unlikely that Tony Blair, or Chris Smith, the Shadow Social Security Secretary, will choose to ignore them. A commitment to the three visions explained by the commission — a learning society, full employment and an intelligent welfare state — would indeed be a radical break with current Conservative failure.

Yours faithfully,
GORDON BORRIE, Chairman,
Commission on Social Justice,
Institute for Public Policy Research,
30-32 Southampton Street, WC2.

Politically correct

From Dr J. A. D. Ewart

Sir, Anne McElvoy (article, November 4) says that political correctness is waning, whereas it has triumphed. Thanks to activists in the media, the new jargon is widespread: a journal to which I contribute told me they would change "his" to "his or her" whether I liked it or not.

The sad thing is that all this newspeak will have no effect on sexual, racial or religious bigotry, because that is driven by feelings, and they are independent of words.

Yours politically incorrectly,
J. A. D. EWART,
Delgany, Solesbridge Lane,
Chorleywood,
Rickmansworth, Hertfordshire.

Youthful editors

From Mr Michael Cudlipp

Sir, When my father, Percy Cudlipp, became Editor of the Evening Standard in 1934, aged 28, he was the youngest-ever editor of a Fleet Street newspaper, a record he held until his brother Hugh broke it by becoming Editor of the Sunday Pictorial in 1937, aged 24 (letter, November 6). When Percy succeeded Francis Williams as Editor of the Daily Herald in 1939 he was, like his predecessor, 33 years old.

When I became news editor of The Sunday Times in 1958, aged 24, World's Press News claimed that I was the youngest-ever news editor of a national newspaper. The then managing editor, the late Patrick Murphy, grumbled that The Sunday Times "should not employ children".

Yours sincerely,
MICHAEL CUDLIPP,

Imperial body

From Dom Cuthbert Brogan, OSB

Sir, The monks of St Michael's Abbey, Farnborough, were not a little confused by your report, "Bonapartists beg for Napoleon III's ashes" (November 2). Is the Emperor's body about to be cremated?

The "40,000" who attended Napoleon III's funeral (most historians say 20,000) "in London" must also have been confused, since the funeral was in fact at Chislehurst in Kent. The "ashes" were not "lodged" at St Michael's Abbey, Farnborough, but the abbey, one of the finest pieces of Catholic architecture in England, was built purposely by the Empress Eugénie to receive the remains of all three members of the Imperial Family.

Yours sincerely,
CUTHBERT BROGAN (Sub-Prior),
St Michael's Abbey,
Farnborough, Hampshire.

Room at the top

From Mr R. J. Carlyon

Sir, The answer to Mr Alderson's question (letter, November 7) is a simple one. A model becomes a supermodel if it has at least 115 parts (some of which must move), some transparencies (to be rendered opaque by overzealous use of the polystyrene glue) and some decals or insignia to finish it off.

Anything less would fail to impress the rest of the class, whose envy is the means of confirming the awards of supermodel status.

Sum of all the parts

From the Headmaster of Millfield

Sir, The Internet has many unexpected advantages for us all, not least for the victims of GCSE. An enterprising pupil here, faced with a demanding problem in his mathematics coursework, stuck it on the Internet and invited subscribers to help him solve it.

In his opinion, the best response came from a professor of mathematics at a reputable American university.

Should the professor be credited with the encouraging grade we anticipate for our pupil, and would it have made any difference if our pupil had sought his help from the professor's published work?

Yours faithfully,
CHRISTOPHER MARTIN,

OBITUARIES

ALAN CRICK

Alan Crick, OBE, former director of economic intelligence at the Ministry of Defence, died on October 14 aged 82. He was born on May 14, 1913.

A TRIBUTE to Alan Crick by a senior officer at the end of the Second World War said that his work in unravelling the secrets of the German defences before El Alamein was a crucial factor in the subsequent Allied victory. The accuracy of his analysis, which was later confirmed by documents captured from the enemy, did most on the intelligence side "to enable an economy of effort and casualties which was most remarkable".

Crick went on to serve as an intelligence officer on General Eisenhower's staff at Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Force (SHAEF) before D-Day and was mentioned in dispatches for his work in liaising between the intelligence and planning staffs in the battle for North West Europe.

But the episode for which he was best known occurred in the Western Desert. It was in 1942, five months before the Battle of El Alamein, when he was serving as a field intelligence officer with the Eighth Army. On the night of his first wedding anniversary he received a mysterious summons to Middle East headquarters in Cairo. British troops had captured a German officer who had been on a reconnaissance mission near the southern end of the Gazala Line. It was thought that he might be fully briefed on Rommel's plans for a fresh offensive in the desert.

Rather than subject the prisoner, a Major Rudolph, to a hostile interrogation, British intelligence officers wanted Crick, who was fluent in German, to impersonate a fellow German officer and ingratiate himself with the hapless Rudolph so that he could glean what information he could — bearing in mind that the captured German could well be a "plant".

Crick donned the uniform of a second lieutenant in the Wehrmacht and adopted the character and background details of a friend he had known before the war while he had been taking his doctorate at Heidelberg University. After testing his cover by means of a stern grilling from experienced British interrogators, he was smuggled into the exercise yard of the prison where Rudolph was being held. The ruse was so successful that Rudolph quietly warned his fellow "German" to be wary of two Italian pilots who were also there because he suspected them of being British "stool pigeons".

A thoughtful man who disapproved of Hitler's invasion of the Soviet Union, Rudolph quickly convinced Crick that he was genuine. But, although his assessment of the desert war to that date turned out to be astonishingly accurate, he clearly had not been informed of Rommel's plans. Rudolph lent Crick a crumpled German newspaper as they parted. "I never saw him again," Crick wrote in later life.

Alan John Pitts Crick was born in Toronto, the son of an engineer and inventor who had emigrated to Canada with the intention of starting a new life there. But after about six years, the Cricks became homesick and returned to Britain. After primary school in Minehead, Crick went to Latymer Upper School, Hammersmith, then on to King's College London to read modern languages.

He stayed on for his master's degree in German, then won a scholarship to Heidelberg to study for a doctorate in Germanic studies. After that he worked for a while as a locally employed vice-consul in the British Consulate-General at Danzig — then a free city — helping in the sad task of providing documentation for Jewish families escaping from persecution by the Nazis.

Returning to Britain at the outbreak of war, Crick joined the Army in 1939, was commissioned in the following year and spent some time in Dorset and Somerset, organising auxiliary forces to form a resistance movement in the event of a successful German invasion of this country.

At the end of the war, he was at BAOR headquarters in West Germany, helping to engineer the transition from military to political intelligence. With this background he was a natural choice, on being demobilised, for the newly-formed Joint Intelligence Bureau at the Ministry of Defence.

Crick climbed rapidly through the hierarchy of his department, which changed its name to the Defence Intelligence Staff after the 1964 reorganisation. He had two testing tours in Washington, the first covering the 1956 Suez crisis and the second the assassination of President Kennedy, when Britain was also trying to restore American confidence following a series of embarrassing spy scandals.

Returning from Washington in 1965 he was in the Cabinet Office for three years before returning to the Defence Intelligence Staff at the MoD. He became director of economic intelligence in 1970, retiring three years later at the age of 60.

On leaving Whitehall, Crick joined the Commercial Union Assurance company as economic adviser, retiring for the second time in 1978. Thereafter he spent much of his time indulging his lifelong passion for writing poetry, especially nonsense verse. Several of the latter were published by Penguin in More Comic and Curious Verse while in 1992 Crick brought out his own anthology In The Caves of the Mind, containing his more serious poems in addition to his light verse.

He became chairman of the Conservation Society at Rye, East Sussex, where he lived. But his continuing membership of the Exmoor Society also reflected his underlying affection for the West Country.

Alan Crick was a sturdy, stocky man of great kindness, who combined his German scholarship with a famous sense of fun. During the war in the Western Desert, he perfected an imitation of a German howitzer with which he would alarm his brother officers at night — these included the young Enoch Powell. Powell inherited from Crick the editorship of an army journal called Battledress, and the two men had remained close friends ever since.

Alan Crick married his wife Norah, who was serving in the WAAF, in 1941 after meeting her at a church dance. She died 11 years ago and he is survived by their two daughters.

LETTY GIFFORD

Letty Gifford, MBE, cinema manager, died on November 2 aged 83. She was born on April 22, 1912.

LETTY GIFFORD was a close friend of Benjamin Britten and Peter Pears, and a linchpin of Aldeburgh society. Her husband Charles Gifford was at one time the Aldeburgh Festival's treasurer and vice-chairman, and, since the 1950s, Letty Gifford had found herself drawn into the annual preparations for the festivities. But it was as the manager and chairman of the Aldeburgh Cinema for the past twenty years that she was allowed full rein for her formidable managerial talents.

The Aldeburgh Cinema was a large 1920s, mock-Tudor building on the High Street. Traditionally it had been a mainstream cinema, but distributors had tended to overlook it, with the result that films might be shown there many months after their opening in Leicester Square. By the early 1970s, the cinema had fallen into decline, and appeared to be in danger of closing altogether.

A consortium of townspeople, including Benjamin Britten (who loved old Marx Brothers films), Peter Pears and the Giffords stepped in at this point with funds. As a result the cinema was saved at the eleventh hour, and although it was never offically tied to the festival, the two became closely linked.

Letty Gifford took over the management of the cinema in 1974, becoming its chairman two years later. Her management style was that of an unapologetic autocrat. Although there was, notionally, a board of directors which met monthly, Letty set the agenda, chaired the meetings, wrote the minutes (some suspected before the meeting) and made the decisions. She ran it in the manner of a community service — there was never any hope of making substantial profits — and provided the town's 3,000 inhabitants with an imaginative diet of programming, from art-house productions to middle-of-the-road blockbusters. Attendance figures ranged from six to 250. The building had a capacity of 286, and there was an art gallery attached.

Though Letty Gifford was a novice in the world of cinema administration, it would be wrong to see her as amateurish. Her time there was marked by a series of coups worthy of J. Arthur Rank himself. For instance, Ken Russell showed Salomé's Last Dance (1988) at the cinema for the first time. "It is set in a male brothel," Stephen Spender warned nervous viewers in the programme notes, "and both action and language verge on the obscene." She secured British and world premieres, and once flew to Washington to fetch a film herself. "We have to compete with Cannes of course," she remarked, ruefully, of the town's festival. Recently she won a grant from the National Lottery with which to repair the cinema's chimneys and roof.

Margaret Laetitia Lyell was the daughter of Major the Hon Charles Henry Lyell, and sister of the 2nd Baron Lyell. Her father and grandfather were Liberal MPs, and her mother was a Watney, from the brewing family.

She was educated by governesses, and then at Queen's College, Harley Street, although her mother insisted she spend her summer terms with the family in Venice. Afterwards, at the age of 16, she enrolled at the London School of Economics. Initially, she was accompanied to the school by her mother's lady's maid, but she quickly shook off her chaperone, who found the lectures dull. She graduated in 1931.

During the 1930s she edited two books, A Medieval Postbag, which reprinted medieval letters; and, more seriously, The Acts of the Court of the Mercers Company. In 1937 she married Major the Hon Francis Stewart-Mackenzie of Seaforth. He was killed during the war.

She married her second husband, the economist and diplomat Charles Gifford, in Moscow in 1944. He was then commercial attaché at the British Embassy, and she was his assistant. It was also in Moscow that her first child Patrick was born in 1945, an experience which impelled her to write an essay, How to Give Birth in Russia. After the war, this was published in a book on Russia by her friend, John (later Sir John) Lawrence.

In the late 1940s she moved briefly with her husband to Geneva. While he worked with the United Nations, she was a correspondent for The Economist. During the 1960s she ran a family planning clinic in London.

Aldeburgh claimed the last thirty years of her life. She and her husband bought a house on the outskirts of town in the 1950s, and then moved into the centre.

Letty Gifford quickly became embroiled in local affairs, becoming Mayor of Aldeburgh during the Queen's Silver Jubilee year, and founding the Jubilee Opera, which gave local children a chance to perform new operas. She sat as an independent district councillor on Suffolk Coastal District Council in the mid-1970s. The Giffords' was very much an open house, and numerous visitors — from the Spenders, to American politicians and civil servants — stayed with them.

It was the cinema, however, which took up the bulk of her energies. She was persuaded to retire officially, at the age of 83, only this summer and remained in very good health until recently. She died just days before she was due to receive her MBE at the Palace.

Her husband died last year, and she is survived by four sons and a daughter.

NORMAN DUGDALE

Norman Dugdale, CB, civil servant and poet, died in Belfast on October 27 aged 74. He was born in Burnley on February 6, 1921.

NORMAN DUGDALE was a rather unusual creature — for England — a senior civil servant who was also a published poet. In the early 1960s he was a member of a group of young poets in Belfast, inspired by Philip Hobsbaum, which included Seamus Heaney, Michael Longley and Derek Mahon. He went on to publish six slim volumes of poetry, and his collected poems were being prepared for publication when he died. In his day job he was one of the most influential civil servants in Northern Ireland, retiring in 1984 as Permanent Secretary of the Stormont DHSS.

Norman Dugdale was educated at Burnley Grammar School and graduated from Manchester University, where he was an exact contemporary of the novelist Anthony Burgess. He joined the Board of Trade as an Assistant Principal in 1941, and in 1948 was transferred to the Northern Ireland Civil Service and the Ministry of Commerce, Belfast.

After that, his progress through the NI Civil Service (in the field of health and social services) was effortless: Assistant Secretary, 1955; Senior Assistant Secretary, 1964; Second Secretary, 1968; and Permanent Secretary 1970. In 1974 he was appointed CB.

Dugdale was the main architect of the National Health Service in Northern Ireland. A man of compassion, he preferred to regard the DHSS as the caring department and to define the purpose of the NHS as the right care at the right place at the right time — free at point of delivery. His own tragic struggle with chronic diabetes gave him an especial interest in the care of the chronically ill. He also espoused the interests of the old, the poor, the handicapped and the mentally ill.

His proudest achievement was to have built a Northern Ireland model of care which combined general practitioners, acute hospitals and social services in the same administrative framework. He laboured tirelessly to make the social security system more responsive to need and more user-friendly, and to improve accountability.

He played an important role in medical education and in developing, particularly through the University of Ulster, a wide range of degree-level courses for professions ancillary to medicine. He was also mainly responsible for the agreement between the Unionist Government and the Roman Catholic Church which enabled the Mater Hospital to enter the health service on acceptable terms, and he was a consistent supporter of the voluntary sector.

On retirement he continued his efforts unabated — as chairman of Bryson House, the Belfast charity, as NI representatives of the British Council, and as a governor of the National Institute for Social Work.

Meanwhile he was pursuing his interest in poetry. He was a precise rather than a prolific poet with a gift for the striking figure and the telling phrase. His interest in classical Greek led him to master modern Greek and the poetry of Constantine Cafavy (like himself a poet and civil servant), which he translated with grace and empathy.

Norman Dugdale was a reserved man of great courtesy, known to his colleagues and ministers as a legendary and meticulous draftsman. He was always the imperturbable and unflappable civil servant, but there was nevertheless always a special rapport with those who shared his burning passion for social justice — in particular with Paddy Devlin, Peter Melchett and Chris Patten.

He was extremely tenacious in following what he thought the right course. He steered a path through the complexities of Northern Ireland politics and administration and emerged admired by all, his integrity intact and his contribution to society widely recognised. He was awarded an honorary DLitt by the University of Ulster in 1984.

He is survived by his wife, the painter Mary Dugdale, whom he married in 1949.

METROPOLITAN IOANN

Ivan Snychev, Metropolitan Ioann of St Petersburg, died from a heart attack on November 2 aged 68. He was born on October 9, 1927.

WITH the death of Metropolitan Ioann, the Russian Orthodox Church is relieved of its most controversial voice. His strong right-wing and anti-Semitic views were an embarrassment to the leaders of his Church and to its more open-minded members.

Ivan Snychev was born into a Russian peasant family. He was religious from an early age and began a monastic career straight after the Second World War. He followed a scholarly path, becoming a Master of Theology in 1966 and a Doctor of Church History — a relatively rare distinction — in 1988. He was made a bishop in 1965 and appointed to the Kuibyshev diocese, where he served until 1990.

His appointment to be Metropolitan of Leningrad and Ladoga in July 1990 was a surprise. He was not a careerist nor involved in foreign affairs, the usual prerequisites for such a senior post. Moreover, in a leaked report of the Council for Religious Affairs to the Central Committee of the Soviet Communist Party, which divided bishops into three categories according to their loyalty to the Soviet regime, Ioann was ranked in the third, or least reliable, category. However, despite this he became the second-ranking hierarch in the Church and a member of the Holy Synod.

It is not clear why this in many ways exemplary bishop became such an embarrassment to his Church after his transfer to Leningrad. Like other intensely patriotic Russians concerned for his country's future, he went to extremes. At the end of 1992 a series of interviews and articles began to appear in the right-wing daily Sovetskaya Rossiya. These intemperate, lengthy diatribes expressed a Russian nationalist viewpoint and identified various enemies of Russia, especially Jews.

Ioann even revived the old idea of the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion", allegedly a verbatim record of conspiratorial meetings aimed at founding a Zionist superstate but long ago shown to be a fabrication, possibly by the tsarist secret police.

Ioann was forbidden to publish his views in the church press, and Patriarch Aleksi II was obliged to disown him publicly, saying that he had no authority to speak in the name of the Church. There are some who believe that Metropolitan Ioann was a naive, inexperienced patriot manipulated into being a mouthpiece for more sinister forces: whatever the truth of the matter, he did great harm to his Church.

ON THIS DAY

November 9, 1935

This starling was clearly anxious to observe closely the installation of the new Lord Mayor of London even perching, at one point, on the head of the City Marshal. The bird may remind readers of the Jackdaw of Rheims, in the poem by R.H. Barham, which stole a cardinal's ring.

A STARLING AT GUILDHALL

An inquisitive and enterprising starling played the principal part in the installation of Sir Percy Vincent as Lord Mayor of London at Guildhall yesterday.

Before the ceremony the Lord Mayor (Sir Stephen Killik) and the Lord Mayor-Elect (Sir Percy Vincent) had given a luncheon at the Mansion House, at which the Lord Mayor gave the toast of Sir Percy Vincent, and the Lord Mayor-Elect gave that of the Lord Mayor.

After luncheon the procession to Guildhall was watched by crowds of people in spite of falling rain. The Lord Mayor went in full state, trumpeters of the Royal Household, picturesque in their scarlet capes and velvet caps, blowing a fanfare as he entered his coach. By contrast, the Lord Mayor-Elect drove alone in a private car without display.

At Guildhall Sir Stephen Killik presided over a Court of Aldermen for the last time as Lord Mayor, and took farewell of his brethren and the high officers. The company then proceeded to the Great Hall.

Shortly before their arrival three starlings had entered the Hall. They seemed extraordinarily tame, walked about the carpeted floor, and perched on the Sword Rest. When the procession entered two of the birds sought refuge on the stone cornice in one corner of the Hall. The other, however, hopped on to the back of an aldermanic chair. Disturbed by the coming of its occupant, it flew to the other side of the Hall, alighting on the head of the Senior Sheriff, Colonel and Alderman Laurie. Waved from there, it flew to the top of the oaken screen, whence it watched with perky interest the Lord Mayor-Elect make the declaration to fulfil the duties of his office and the descent of Sir Stephen Killik from the Mayoral Chair and the ascent of Sir Percy Vincent.

Apparently the bird was not satisfied and then perched on the top of a wand held by a committee-man. Entirely unperturbed it turned round on the silver head and viewed the quaintly clad assembly, which was more concerned in its doings than in the ceremony. Sword and Mace and the other insignia of office were returned to the outgoing Lord Mayor, handed over by Sir Stephen Killik to his successor and returned to the officials.

Then came the bird's most daring feat. The Comptroller took to the table, as is usual, the great parchment document setting forth the agreement of the incoming Lord Mayor to accept £12,500 in lieu of all ancient fees and emoluments of the Mayoralty. Apparently desiring to examine this at closer quarters, the bird flew to the head of the City Marshal, who was standing immediately behind the Mayoral Chair. It remained there while Sir Percy Vincent affixed his signature, the City Marshal standing at attention. Evidently satisfied when the document was closed (and encouraged, perhaps by a slight twist of the Marshal's head) the starling again took flight and made for the Sword Bearer's Cap of Maintenance. This, however, is of fur and was evidently a less secure perch. The bird fluttered at the edge for a moment, but failed to obtain adequate foot-hold and left for the unoccupied end of the Hall, where an official picked it up and carried it from the Hall.

Hotel chains join race to Beirut

LEADING international hotel chains are racing to become the first Western hoteliers to open hotels in the Lebanese capital of Beirut after the end of the civil war. The Inter-Continental and Marriott chains are planning to open luxury hotels in the city next month, and are due to be followed by other hotel groups over the next few years.

Inter-Continental is expected to pip Marriott with a mid-December opening. It is taking over the 94-room Le Vendome hotel, closed for the past decade, and has spent more than £6 million completely renovating the property which includes four presidential-style suites, a business centre and function rooms. Marriott says its 174-room hotel in the city, located two miles north of the airport, and two miles from the centre of Beirut, will open on December 22.

These hotels will be followed next year by a 266-room Forte hotel which will operate under the Meridien brand, and a 485-room Hilton International planned for 1998. This hotel was built in 1974 but never opened because of the start of the war. Inter-Continental also plans in 1998 to reopen the 600-room Phoenicia hotel which it first opened in 1961 but which was closed in 1976.

Lunch on the park

A SPECIAL two-course lunch menu for £15 per person is on offer until the end of the month in the Restaurant on the Park at the Hyde Park Hotel in Knightsbridge, the flagship of the Forte group. The restaurant (not the basement venture in the hotel run by Marco Pierre White) overlooks the adjacent park. Details: 0171-235 2000. Another Forte hotel, the Grosvenor House on Park Lane, has also extended the hours of its new brasserie style Café Nico — run by Nico Ladenis, who also operates the Ninety Park Lane restaurant out of the hotel — to between 11am and 11pm every day, including Sunday. Details: 0171-495 2275.

Amex bonus

AMERICAN Express cardholders can get added benefits at two hotel chains until the end of March. Inter-Continental frequent business guests who choose the hotel's Global Business Options package and pay by Amex get the choice of two rather than one options, including room upgrades, food and beverage discounts, double airline mileage points or a personal gift. Details: 0345 5814444. Amex cardholders can also book three nights' accommodation for the price of two (at £34.50 a night per room) at the Travelodge chain of hotels. Details: 0800 850950.

Hyatt cuts rates

HYATT hotels is offering savings of up to 45 per cent off the published room rate at 56 of its hotels worldwide from December until the end of February. Hotels in London, Paris, Madrid, New York and Istanbul are included. The London rate, for example, comes down from £270 plus VAT to £180 plus VAT. Details: 0345 581666.

Winter in Paris

A 25 per cent discount off the normal rate of FFr 540 (about £72) is being offered to British visitors to the Hotel De Mericourt in Paris from now until the end of January. The hotel is conveniently located close to the Pompidou Centre and other Paris attractions. Details: 00 331 43 38 7363.

Gold Cup special

A SPECIAL Hennessy Gold Cup weekend break is available from the Hilton National at Newbury, Berkshire, from November 24-26, including dinner with the former National Hunt jockey Peter Scudamore and a private visit to the stables of the trainer Jenny Pitman, as well as tickets and transport to Newbury racecourse. The cost is £226 per person for two nights, lunch and dinners included. Details: 0345 581595.

Up to par

The Old Course Hotel at St Andrews says its new Duke's course has settled in so well that it will now be open for the entire winter. Its special golf break, priced at £98.50 per person per night and including breakfast, dinner and one round of golf, has been extended until the end of March. Details: 01334 474371.

Ritz opts out

The Ritz Hotel in London has terminated its management contract with the Mandarin Oriental Hotel Group after the £75 million takeover of the hotel last month by Ellerman Investments, owned by David and Frederick Barclay. The Mandarin group had taken over the running of the hotel in Piccadilly in May last year.

DAVID CHURCHILL

France still top for British

By Harvey Elliott

BRITAIN'S tourism "trade gap" with the rest of the world is widening as the number of citizens travelling on both business and holiday grows sharply.

A total of £14.5 billion was spent by Britons on almost 40 million trips abroad last year, which compares with less than £10 billion spent by the record 21 million visitors who came here.

The figures are revealed today in Travel Trends, the most detailed study of the ebbs and flows of travel to have been undertaken by the Central Statistical Office.

Throughout the year, teams of researchers at every air and sea port in Britain interviewed 229,000 passengers to build up a picture of who travels where, how, why and when, and how much they spend.

The "typical" Briton travelling abroad, they say, heads for France or Spain, mainly in the summer, spends £363 each visit, stays an average of 11 nights each trip and is aged between 25 and 55.

The "typical" visitor to Britain is again 25 to 55, from the US, France or Germany, invariably heads for London, comes on holiday in the summer, stays for nine nights and spends £467 each visit.

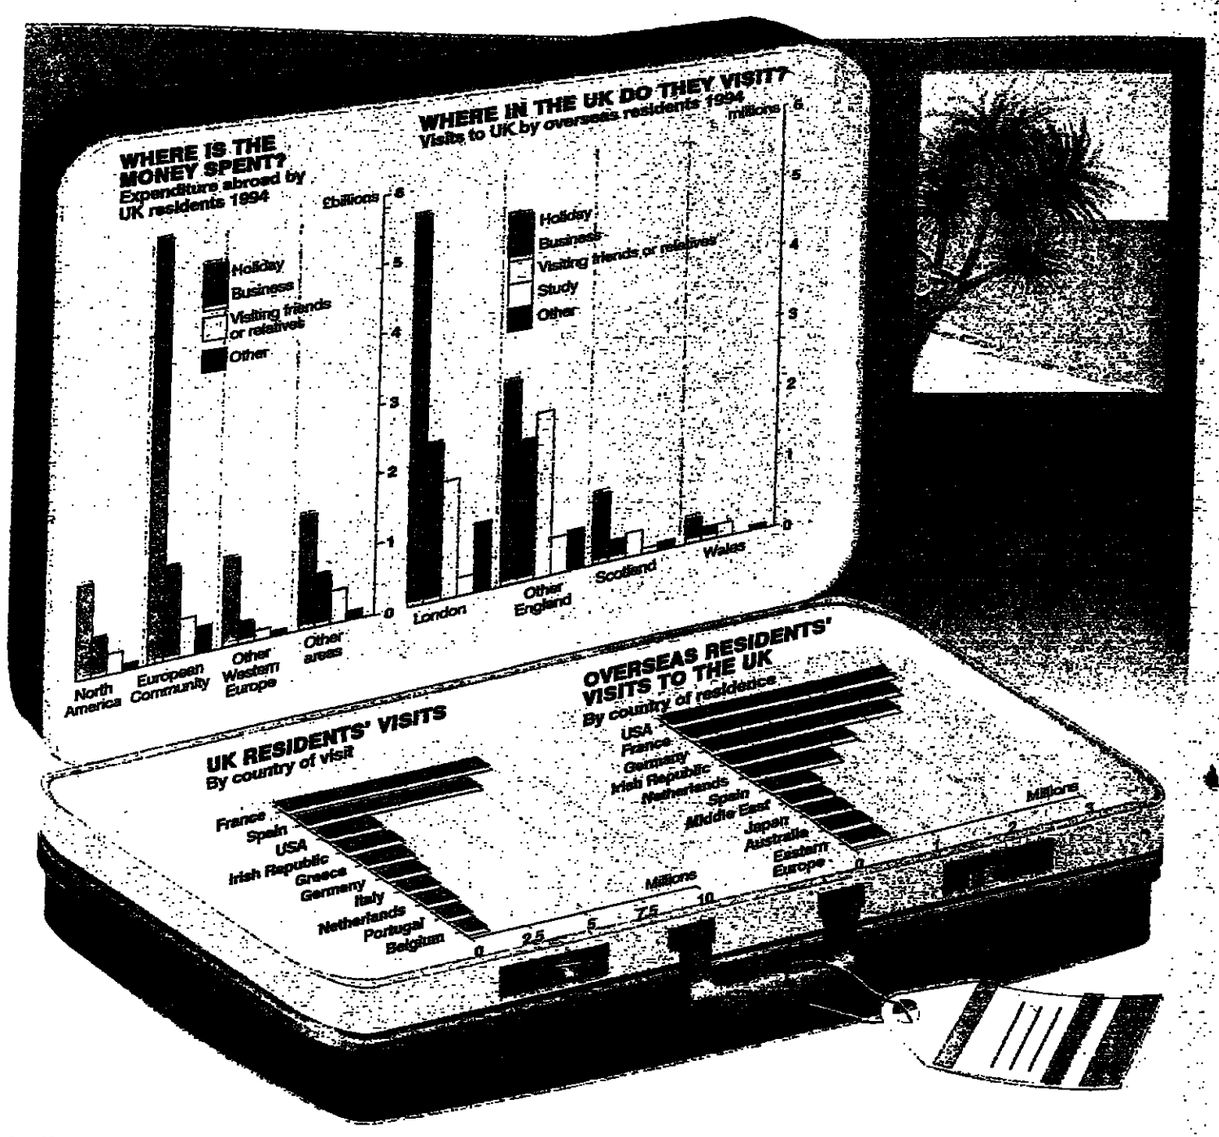

The number of people travelling has risen dramatically in the past 20 years, and is still growing fast. For example, fewer than half the number of visitors who came to Britain last year made the journey in 1975. And in that same year only 12 million Britons travelled abroad compared with 40 million last year. They spent 15 times as much as they did in 1975.

Since 1975 — with the exception of 1991 during the Gulf War — the growth in travel has been inexorable. In 1994, for example, 11.6 per cent more Britons travelled abroad than in the previous year, compared with an increase of 8.4 per cent in those coming to the United Kingdom.

The survey reveals that the idea that women travel mainly to shop is completely false. The average British woman's daily expenditure while abroad was about £10 lower than that of men, and the gap is bigger for those aged over 44.

The trend is repeated in those who come to Britain, with middle-aged men spending on average £93 a day compared with women who spend £54.30 a day on average.

France retained its position as the most popular destination for Britons, attracting more than nine million last year — a fifth of all foreign travel. But Spain was close behind and it took the lion's share of British spending money — £2.5 billion compared with the £1.96 billion spent in France.

In 1994 Americans were the largest group to visit the UK followed by the French and Germans. Indeed visitors from the leading five countries — the US, France, Germany, the Irish Republic and The Netherlands — represented 50 per cent of all the people who came here, whether on holiday or business, although they spent under 40 per cent of the total.

The length of time that people stay in Britain varies widely, from 3.4 nights for those from Belgium to 32.3 nights for travellers from the Caribbean.

By far the bulk of inbound travel was due to foreign visitors on holiday, of whom a third were on some form of inclusive tour or package arrangement. For those from Europe, business travel was the second most frequently cited purpose of the visit. However, the second biggest group from more distant parts comprised travellers "visiting friends and relatives".

Europeans spent less time in the UK on average than visitors from any other region, less per visit and less per day. Overall the average expenditure per day was highest when visiting on business and lowest, not surprisingly, when visiting friends and relatives. Business visitors spent almost twice the average amount spent by those on holiday.

In total, says the report, 40 per cent of the expenditure by overseas residents was from holiday visits, just over a quarter from business visits, with the remainder from visits to friends or relatives.

By far the biggest proportion headed for London, which attracted 10.5 million visitors last year, while Northumberland could attract only 30,000.

Meanwhile, over 70 per cent of all visits made overseas by UK residents in 1994 were to EU countries. North America accounted for just 7 per cent of visits but 14 per cent of expenditure.

"There is not much variation in the daily spending of UK residents wherever they travel to throughout the world," the report says. The highest recorded spending was in Iceland with a daily average of just over £60 and the lowest was in Yugoslavia with just under £20 a day.

The package holiday is still alive and well and accounted for 15 million of the 27 million holiday trips made by British residents last year.

Belfast reaps peace dividend

BY DAVID CHURCHILL

BELFAST HAS seen a doubling of the numbers of conference delegates visiting the city since the ceasefire began in Northern Ireland more than a year ago, although some meetings organisers remain hesitant to book events too far ahead in case the peace breaks down.

"We are insisting on an escape clause in all our contracts with hotels and venues in and around Belfast so that we are not left with a commitment to hold our meeting there if the ceasefire does not hold," says one leading British conference organiser.

But the fact that the peace has lasted so long is encouraging organisations and associations to consider Belfast and Northern Ireland as a convention destination.

The European Society for Paediatric Research is holding its annual meeting in the city next year for the first time and another medical association is planning to return to Belfast before the end of the decade for its first visit in almost 40 years.

Even the Titanic Historical Research Society from the United States has booked its annual meeting for its 250 members in Belfast next year.

The new appeal of Belfast for conventions also holds true in Ireland as a whole: the Irish National Teachers' Organisation is to hold its annual meeting north of the border for the first time next March.

"The level of conference inquiries has increased dramatically over the past 12 months as the city and country have offered a new venue for organisations which may have become a bit jaded with their existing meetings venues in British and European cities," says Michael McCormick, manager of Northern Ireland Conference Bureau.

"We are also seeing twice as many delegates actually coming to Belfast than those who had confirmed bookings before the improved political situation," he says.

Belfast's main conference and exhibition venue is the Kings Hall Centre, located three miles from the city centre and with a capacity of up to 5,000. But the city's new commitment to wooing conference delegates is reflected in the £29 million Waterfront Hall complex due to open in January 1997. This is the first purpose-built conference facility in the North, with a capacity for more than 2,200 delegates, and forms part of the new Laganbank retail and office development. This will include a 200-room four-star Hilton International hotel.

Latest figures from the Northern Ireland Tourist Board also show that 543,000 Britons visited Northern Ireland in the first eight months of this year, representing an 11 per cent increase on the same period in 1994.

Hotel occupancy has also been running consistently above the pre-ceasefire levels: in August, the latest month for which figures are available, the occupancy level was 62 per cent compared with 49 per cent the year before. The 72 per cent occupancy level in June was the highest ever recorded by hotels in Northern Ireland.

Holiday bookings collapse

BY HARVEY ELLIOTT

TENS OF thousands of summer holidays are being withdrawn from sale after a drop of at least 30 per cent in the number of early bookings.

Customers who have already booked are to be offered compensation for having their flight times changed or their hotels altered even though they will not travel for another eight months.

The leading tour operator, Thomson, was the first to take action by withdrawing 50,000 holidays from its brochures. In some cases, one flight out of three is being cut and passengers "consolidated" onto the other two. Hotels which originally agreed to provide Thomson with, for example, 200 beds a week, are being told that they will not be taking up more than 150.

Other major tour operators are either negotiating with hotels and airlines to reduce capacity now or are preparing plans for "significant" cuts in their programmes.

Chris Kirker, chairman of the Association of Independent Tour Operators, believes that Britain has fallen out of love with the two-week package holiday. "People are tired of the traditional package holiday," he said. "They want something different."

It is not a view shared by the major tour operators which believe that the sharp decline reflects a general unease about the economy, a lack of confidence, concerns about the Budget and an unwillingness to commit large sums of money in advance.

Keith Betton of the Association of British Travel Agents said that the bald statistics may be distorted by the fact that brochures have been on display for a short time.

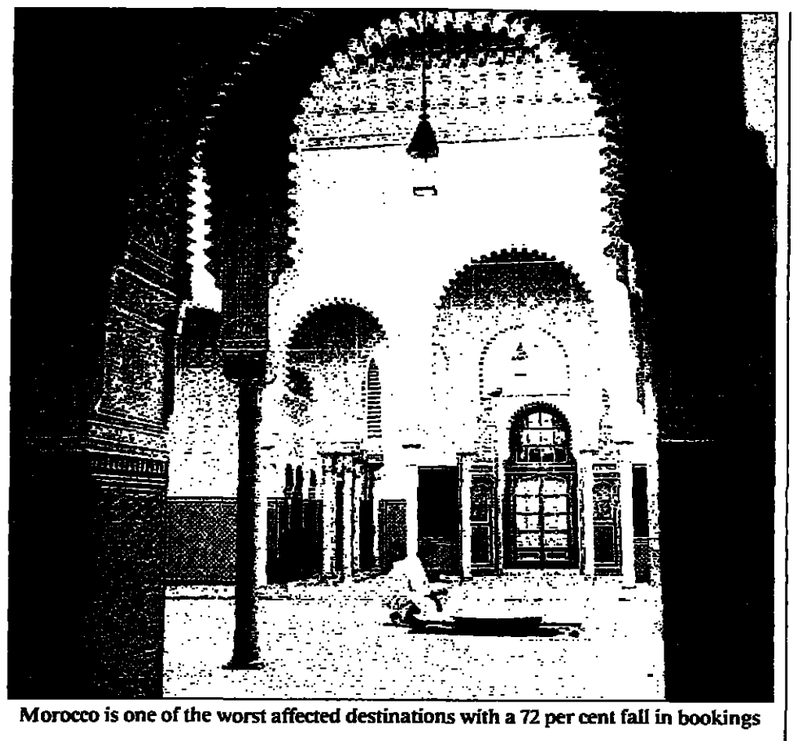

"There is no doubt that we will be down by the end of the summer but I can't believe that four million people will suddenly decide not to go on holiday," he said.

But even the long-haul holiday market, which generally does better than short-haul, is down. British Airways Holidays said that it had seen a fall of 8 per cent compared with last year.

£29 air fare takes off

BRITAIN's first genuine cut-price airline is to begin services from Luton to Glasgow tomorrow with single fares as low as £29, Harvey Elliott writes.

EasyJet, created by a Greek shipping millionaire, is hoping to make flying within Britain "as affordable as a pair of jeans". And next year it plans to introduce similar low prices on many of Europe's most expensive air routes.

There will be no tickets issued for the three-times-a-day flights: seats will be sold direct to passengers either by telephone or through the Internet. Payment will be by credit card or, if necessary, by cash at the departure gate.

At present, the cheapest return fare from Heathrow to Glasgow must be booked well in advance and costs £74, but must include a Saturday night stay. A fully flexible ticket costs £234 return with both BA and British Midland.

For the first two weeks all seats on EasyJet flights will cost £29. But after that seats will be sold on a "first come first served" basis. Once all the £29 seats are booked on the flight, prices will slowly rise to £39, £49 and eventually £59 just before take-off. The fares are non-refundable which, the airline believes, will prevent the need for overbooking and guarantee everyone a seat.

The decision on when to raise the fare will be taken by the airline depending on the popularity of a particular flight. "If a particular flight is not selling well we may offer all the seats at £29, but then increase the price to a maximum of £59 single if the demand is huge," the airline's founder, Stelios Haji-Ioannou, says.

Channel Tunnel war begins to bite

Ferries target western routes

BY STEVE KEENAN

FERRY companies have slashed prices on longer routes to France to counter the growing threat of the Channel Tunnel.

The car-carrying Le Shuttle service this week carried its one millionth vehicle through the tunnel, a figure undoubtedly padded out by motorcycles, trailers, campervans and caravans. But Le Shuttle has taken about one-third of the car market on the Dover-Calais route in its first year, and will next summer be fully operational in the hugely congested market.

With the new ferry company Sea France operating out of Dover, there will be a total of 76 sailings a day to Calais, compared with 64 this year.

"That will just about put the port at full capacity," said a harbour board spokesman.

As a counter-measure, Brittany Ferries has pledged to match or undercut Dover-Calais fares on its routes from Portsmouth and Poole to Caen and Cherbourg, despite the crossing taking up to four times as long. The company needs to protect its western Channel routes from the inevitable fallout on Dover-Calais, and next week launches a new seasonal route between Plymouth and St Malo. But its initiative has now been matched by the market leader, P&O European Ferries, which this week said it will charge passengers the same fare, whether they travel by car to Calais, Le Havre or Cherbourg.

Le Shuttle and rivals Stena Line, Hoverspeed and Sea France will announce 1996 fares at next week's World Travel Market in London.

P&O has already said fares will rise by an average 6 per cent, with its top-line return price rising from £320 to £339. But Brittany has maintained or reduced fares, with its lead-in price on the Portsmouth-Caen route falling to £105 from £114. With renewed competition next year, it is highly unlikely the ferries will hold the line on price. The cost of crossing the Channel fell by 20 per cent in 1995, with price cuts all through the summer for the first time.

But P&O's chairman, Graeme Dunlop, did his best to post an upbeat message. "Our moderate price increases will help to keep the 1996 tariffs at a level which more accurately reflects the true price of crossing the Channel," he said.

Airlines lose out to the tunnel

THE OPENING of the Channel Tunnel has cut the airlines' share of the market between London and Paris by 13 per cent and by 10 per cent between London and Brussels, according to British Airways. Harvey Elliott writes.

The total market — including airlines, trains and ferries — has increased by 27 per cent to Paris and by 30 per cent to Brussels since the Channel Tunnel opened.

Robert Ayling, BA's managing director, said that the airline had managed to maintain its share of the reduced aviation market and still planned to introduce the new larger Boeing 777 twin-jet on the Paris route when it is delivered next week.

But Mr Ayling gave warning of further "attrition" as an increasing number of business travellers switched to the tunnel.

BA's rival British Midland is introducing smaller aircraft on the routes and attempting to move its "centre of gravity" away from the near European cities such as Amsterdam, Paris and Brussels and opening up new routes in the rapidly expanding Eastern European market.

British Midland reports better than expected sales on its two new services to Prague and Zurich and is now talking to governments about new services to Budapest, Warsaw, Vienna and Moscow.

"Our figures are roughly the same as BA's," said Austin Reid, the managing director. "We want to develop routes which are between one-and-a-half hours and two hours away, although we know that there are bound to be many hurdles to overcome before we get permission to compete with the existing airlines on those routes."

Its first priority will be to persuade the Czech Government to enable the company to operate two services a day to Prague rather than the present one which, British Midland claims, makes it impossible to offer flights at the most popular times of the day.

Branson in Asian deal

RICHARD Branson has signed a deal with Malaysia Airlines allowing the Asian company to take over his Virgin Atlantic airline's rights to six flights a week between London and Kuala Lumpur, Tony Dawe writes.

The agreement, added to Malaysia's own rights, means Malaysia can fly twice-daily on the route and Branson need only provide the occasional Virgin stewardess on the supposedly joint-operated flights.

Branson has also persuaded Malaysia Airlines' chairman Tajudin Ramli to sell Virgin Cola on all the flights, and he is hoping the airline will adopt his in-flight music entertainment services.

Air crews fly into radiation scare

ALARMING claims will be made in Tokyo today about the dangers of flying for too long in commercial aircraft at high level.

International airline pilots will be told that two new surveys indicate that air crews are up to ten times more likely to suffer cell damage than the general public, because of the increased amount of radiation at high altitude.

Whatever problems there may be — and many insist that the fears are groundless — they could not affect passengers, and only those crew flying near either the North or South Poles on a regular basis are even remotely likely to be at risk. Nonetheless, some pilots flying for the German airline Lufthansa are already so concerned that they are carrying Geiger counters to check radiation levels on the flight deck.

Captain Hans Lebuser, of the German Cockpit Association's radiation working group, says: "We funded our own study into the effect of radiation on human chromosomes and discovered that pilots were between eight and ten times more likely to have abnormalities than the general population."

The Travel Business
HARVEY ELLIOTT

An even bigger survey, carried out by Italian pilots, showed exactly the same results, he says.

The European Union is producing a detailed study into the problem which is expected to be published within the next few months, and the Civil Aviation Authority said that it too was "aware" of the concerns.

When all the research has been analysed, pilots are likely to press for a restriction on flying hours and operating heights and regular changes in the routes they operate to ensure that they remain within the safe limits.

Apparently, the potentially harmful particles come from outer space and are drawn towards both Poles by magnetic forces. They dissipate as they near Earth but some reach ground level, exposing everyone to some degree of cosmic radiation. "There is no doubt that cosmic radiation is a danger," Geoff Neesham, of the International Federation of Airline Pilots, says.

British Airways is so certain that there is no real problem that the airline is now considering removing the radiation monitoring equipment fitted to Concorde. The supersonic aircraft, which routinely fly across the Atlantic at above 50,000 feet, have been checking radiation levels for more than 20 years without discovering any cause for alarm.

For the sake of those who earn their living ferrying people from one side of the world to the other, it is surely time that international research was co-ordinated and that any lurking fears are officially put to rest.

Britain wins on cheap hotels

BRITISH hotel workers are less well paid, much less qualified and change jobs far more often than their continental counterparts, Harvey Elliott writes.

But British hoteliers spend much less refurbishing their properties than their opposite numbers in France or Germany, charge less, let more rooms and make more profit, a CBI study of the European hotel industry claimed yesterday.

The report says that the average cost of a room in a three and four-star hotel in Britain is £50 a night, compared with £71 in Germany and £58 in France. On average, 70 per cent of British hotel rooms are filled, compared with only 58 per cent on the Continent. Pre-tax profit levels, at 17 per cent, are almost twice as much as those in France and 5 percentage points higher than Germany.

Staff costs were 27 per cent of turnover, compared with 33 per cent in France and 36 per cent in Germany. This enabled British hoteliers to employ more people.

The percentage of vocationally qualified hotel staff in Britain was only 20 per cent, compared with 31 per cent in France and a massive 68 per cent in Germany. There was a turnover of British hotel staff of 33 per cent a year, however, compared with 19 per cent and 16 per cent respectively in France and Germany.

The CBI's Tourism Action Group said that the problems had to be tackled. "We have a skills gap, and we are not investing enough in refurbishing hotels and building new ones," said the BAA chief executive Sir John Egan, as he launched the report in London yesterday.

"British hotels have a much lower proportion of qualified staff than their French and German counterparts," he said. "This means that they are spending time in training of a remedial nature. In Germany a chef is trained before he arrives for a job. In Britain he has to be taught the basics on the job."

He said, however, that the introduction of a minimum wage would not help the industry to expand. He also attacked the British planning system for holding up the development of hotels, and English Heritage which, he says, "says 'no' to everything".

ICS warning on mis-selling of personal pension plans

Advisers crash with debts of £4m

By Robert Miller

THE Investors Compensation Scheme issued a warning to investors over bad advice being given to investors on personal pension plans after eight independent financial advisers crashed with debts of more than £4 million.

The ICS, the ultimate safety net for investors who lose money through bad advice, theft or fraud said it expected the final compensation bill to be much higher.

Investigators from the compensation scheme expressed concern at the disturbing new trend uncovered in the latest batch of compensation claims. They said they had found that many investors have been the victims of bad advice particularly in relation to personal pension plans and other long-term investments. These produce high commission rates for advisers but in many instances the advice is unsuitable to individual personal circumstances.

The mis-selling trend was highlighted in a Which? survey published this week. Researchers from the Consumers' Association found that financial advisers were breaking the rules laid down by City watchdogs by offering bad and sometimes "appalling" advice to investors.

One of the compensation scheme's failed firms Glen Fisher Insurance Consultants, of Kent and Surrey, allegedly advised a lorry driver earning £13,000 a year to put a £3,000 industrial injury payment into a regular premium pension plan.

The driver, who has two young children, made clear that he wanted access to his money and that he could not afford to pay a £3,000 regular annual premium into a personal pension. His money is now locked away and he faces an annual bill of £3,000 until he retires in around 15 years time.

The largest potential liability from the companies declared in default by the ICS yesterday relates to IMF Financial Services of Finchley in London which crashed with debts of at least £3.3 million. The claims against this company also concern alleged negligent investment advice concerning pension plans.

In the case of Lifetime Independent Financial Advisers of Stoke-on-Trent, Mervyn Richard Hill, a former director of the company, was released from prison in February this year after serving a six month sentence for the misappropiation of £55,000 from a trade union pension fund. Claims from investors with this company also relate to alleged negligent advice.

The ICS, which has paid out nearly £100 million to 8,900 investors in 214 failed firms since 1988, also declared Clive Fayers Financial Services of Hertfordshire in default, a legal mechanism used to trigger compensation payments. The firm was struck off the Register of Companies and dissolved in August 1994. The claims relate to alleged negligent advice especially that involving home income plans based on investment bonds.

Other firms put on the ICS default list include Tudor Financial Services of Bury St Edmunds, Suffolk for alleged negligent advice to a customer to opt out of an occupational pension scheme and take out a personal pension plan.

Richard John Collier, Lee Charles Shurey and Martin Anthony Chedgy, who traded as Richmond Investments in Teignmouth, Devon was placed on the ICS list for alleged negligent investment advice as was First Equity Financial Services, which originally traded in Middlesex and later at Comberton, Cambridge. Nicholas Plant, who traded as William Lewis Financial Group in Staffordshire and Warrington, was declared bankrupt in July last year with net liabilities of £610,000.

Forte defence document gives no mention of the demerger

By Eric Reguly

FORTE'S defence document, published yesterday, forecast a sharp rise in profits in the current financial year as the turnround in the hotels sector takes grip, but disappointed shareholders by revealing no additional information about the proposed demerger of its restaurants.

Granada, which has offered £3.3 billion for Forte, called the defence document "empty" and said it contained nothing that makes it believe it should raise its bid. Gerry Robinson, Granada's chief executive, said: "This is an incredibly weak response."

Forte expects a pre-tax profit of £185 million in the year to January 31, up 46 per cent from the £127 million profit reported in the 1994-95 year. Earnings per share, it said, should rise to 14.1p from 10.1p. This is slightly ahead of City estimates. Sir Rocco Forte, chairman, said the "results are improving dramatically, business has strong momentum and we are at the early stage of the cyclical upswing".

Forte said cash flow from operations will "comfortably exceed dividend payments" after making £175 million in capital expenditures. But no mention was made of boosting the dividend, which was cut from 9.91p to 7.5p in 1993.

The company said the sale of assets worth about £200 million is under way, on top of the £950 million already sold. This week, Forte sold its Griersons wine business for £22.7 million and is close to selling its Travelodge budget hotel chain in the US. Sir Rocco said no details were available about the demerger, which would split the group into separate hotels and restaurants companies, because work has barely begun on the proposal. "We're at the very early stage of the game," he said. "Demergers are not simple things to do."

The plan would also see the demerger or sale of the 68 per cent ownership of the Savoy Hotel chain, which includes the Savoy, the Connaught and the Berkeley in London. Granada also said it would sell Savoy Hotel, which it called a "trophy" asset.

The document reveals Sir Rocco sold 382,000 Forte shares at 230p each in June. He said: "I regret the sale because there's a hell of a lot more value here." Forte closed at 338½p, up ½. Granada's share and cash option was worth 322p yesterday.

Noboa to launch £100m Geest bid

By Eric Reguly

NOBOA, the Ecuadorean group that sells bananas under the Bonita brand name, is poised to bid for Geest's banana business. A bid of about £100 million is expected by the end of this month.

The bid would be a blow to Fyffes, the Irish banana distributor which wants to take control of Geest, its main competitor in the British market. Fyffes and the Windward Islands Banana Development Company, or Wibdeco, which is a large supplier of bananas to Geest, have entered into discussions about launching a joint bid. Analysts have said that Fyffes and Wibdeco would have to offer about £75 million.

The offer could trigger a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Fyffes and Geest are each thought to have 20 per cent of the British banana market, though some estimates put their shares at much higher levels. Noboa's market share in Britain is much smaller.

Several supermarkets are known to have concerns about the potential market power of Fyffes and Wibdeco should their bid succeed.

Wibdeco has been holding talks with Noboa in anticipation of its bid. The co-operative, which represents banana growers in St Vincent, St Lucia, Granada and Dominica, could bid jointly with Noboa but is more likely to enter into a long-term supply arrangement. Noboa has hired financial advisers but would not identify them.

Noboa runs the world's fourth-largest banana business, after Chiquita, Dole and Del Monte. It has supply contracts with some 1,600 banana growers and operates one of the world's largest fleets of refrigerated cargo ships.

Geest recently confirmed that it wanted to sell its banana business and warned that its profits would slip because of "a substantial oversupply of bananas" in Europe.

Names fear harder life after Hardship Scheme is ended

By Sarah Bagnall

LLOYD'S of London provoked severe disquiet for thousands of financially stricken names yesterday when it revealed that it was scrapping the Hardship Scheme, the insurance market's bankruptcy arrangement.

A Lloyd's spokesman said the scheme, that until recently boasted Dr Mary Archer as its chairman, was redundant given the market's radical reconstruction and renewal programme (known as R&R).

Since it was set up in 1989, the Hardship Scheme has been lauded by some names as a vital safety net while others lambasted it as a spying mechanism for the Lloyd's establishment. However, many names saw the scheme as a more tolerable and lenient option than bankruptcy and over the last six years 1,066 have joined, while a further 906 applicants are currently being assessed.

Archer: once ran scheme

Lloyd's said that names will still be offered financial assistance but will have to seek help from the Financial Recovery Department, which collects debt from names. A spokesman for the Association of Lloyds' Members said: "The change may mean a tightening of the hardship regime when it should be relaxed."

Lloyd's has offered a £2.8 billion settlement package to end the mass of legal actions brought by thousands of its hard-hit names. The plan aims to offer names "affordable finality", which means the £2.8 billion is to be divided among names so each can afford to pay a fee to offload all the expected losses in future years. This will enable names, if they wish, to end their Lloyd's association.

The R&R programme is structured so that the fee names will have to pay — referred to as the Equitas bill — is affordable. Lloyd's has set aside £2 billion, which will be used to write-off names' debts. However, recognising that in some cases the Equitas bill will be significant, a tranche of the £2 billion is being held back to distribute among names ruined by the "affordable" bill.

Asda to take Tesco vouchers

ASDA, the supermarket giant, has intensified the fight to win the lucrative family Christmas shop by accepting Tesco money-off vouchers in 16 of its 200 stores (Sarah Bagnall writes).

The Asda stores are all located near Tesco sites.

Archie Norman, Asda's chief executive, said: "The whole business of trying to bribe the customer to be loyal is bogus." He added that Asda believed in offering customers money off now rather than promising it in the future.

The move follows the mass mailing of vouchers by Tesco to its six million Clubcard holders on November 24.

Tesco was the first supermarket chain to issue a loyalty card nationally and the scheme is proving extremely successful, helping the retailer to drive sales forward.

Mr Norman has not ruled out extending the Asda offer to other stores or lengthening the life of the offer.

Lessons from Littlewoods

MELVYN MARCKUS

THE Moores family, who control Littlewoods, the UK's largest private company, would appear to have made an eminently sensible decision. They have refused to be railroaded into a series of City-inspired takeover talks and have decided, in the short term, to remain private and consider their options.

Littlewoods, led by chairman Leonard van Geest, and the 32-strong Moores family, spearheaded by Lady Grantchester, should consider their options long and hard. There is, after all, much to be said for private company status.

It could be argued that Granada's £3.4 billion takeover bid for Forte is a by-product of the pressures faced by the executives of publicly quoted companies. The word "growth" dominates all. It dominates the vocabulary of City analysts, eager to fantasise over an earnings per share figure that, when divided into the share price, produces a low enough price/earnings multiple to justify a strong "buy" recommendation. Buy recommendations may, or may not, lead to share purchases by fund managers but, when they do, commission flows and "growth", for the stockbroking firm that carries out the order and the marketmaking firm that sells the stock, is good. Not that obsession with growth is limited to City analysts. Fund managers, for obvious reasons, are obsessed. Reputations are founded on performance, and performance, give or take, relates to growth. The media represents the joker in the pack. Journalists are obsessed with many things, and opinion pollsters, such as Mori, expend a considerable amount of time and energy each year attempting to ascertain precisely which aspects of a plc financial journalists do focus on.

Against this background, chairmen and chief executives, with a little encouragement from a plethora of advisers, spend an inordinate amount of time doing what is known as "cultivating relationships" with analysts, fund managers and members of the fourth estate. There may be much to be said for cultivating relationships with people who are obsessed, to varying degrees, with growth, but there are dangers. Taken to extremes, who is left looking after the shop?

By and large, industrialists fall into two categories. There are those, of the Lord Hanson school, who are completely in sympathy with the City's calls for go-go performance. In contrast, there is the Lord Weinstock school, albeit with relatively few pupils who last the course. Weinstock, like Hanson, focuses on management (what else is there?), but brings to play a much longer-term perspective in terms of corporate growth. GEC, with the benefit of its cash resources, has more than survived in a defence and aerospace industry that has claimed a host of corporate casualties. Hanson's growth, historically, has been formidable, but, on a p/e of 10 to yield 8 per cent, its shares are currently rated well below GEC's.

All of which brings us back to Granada versus Forte. In an era in which unbundling, by way of disposals and demergers, is all the rage, Granada's tilt at Forte, the UK's largest hotel combine, has met with a distinctly mixed reception. Conglomerates such as BTR, Tomkins, Williams Holdings and Trafalgar House are far from the flavour of the Nineties. The Rank Organisation has divested much of its hotel portfolio in order to focus on the company's core film and leisure operations.

It is the search for perpetual growth that inspired the takeover sprees on both sides of the Atlantic during the Seventies and Eighties. This decade, the name of the game has been to shrink corporate structures, witness ICI's demerger of Zeneca.

Gerry Robinson, Granada's chief executive, has failed to convince the City that a deep-rooted synergy exists between the two companies; the more cynical perspective being that what Mr Robinson has in mind is a good old-fashioned bit of asset stripping. Beneficial, on paper, in the short term; not necessarily so beneficial in the long term. Nor is the City overly impressed with Mr Robinson's readiness to create a company with combined net assets of about £1.6 billion and borrowings of some £3.3 billion. This little piece of financial engineering indicates gearing of well over 200 per cent, dangerously reminiscent of corporate disaster zones of the 1980s. There is much, therefore, for the Moores to dwell on. Wisely, the descendants of Sir John Moores and his brother Cecil voted on Thursday not to open the company's books, at this stage, to any would-be bidders.

Barry Dale, Littlewoods' former chief executive, backed by several City institutions including the Prudential, Electra and Legal & General, proffered tentative terms of about £1.2 billion for the entire company, subject to due diligence.

Sir David Alliance, chairman of N Brown, the mail order enterprise, let it be known that he was prepared to spearhead a £1.1 billion offer in association with Iceland, which operates some 40 food halls in Littlewoods' chain of 128 stores. Sir David was prepared to offer £650 million for Littlewoods' football pools and mail order operation, while Iceland was willing to chip in £450 million for the retail portfolio.

In the event, the Moores family voted four to one against opening their books to either party or, for that matter, numerous other parties which, directly or indirectly, have communicated their interest in playing a role in the evolution of Littlewoods. Quite why City institutions should have imagined that a takeover bid fronted by Mr Dale, who is currently suing the company for wrongful dismissal, would find favour with the family is a moot point.

The Moores family, who have been advised by Michael Gatenby, a seasoned merchant banker, may well opt for a partial flotation on the Stock Exchange within a matter of years. The National Lottery is taking its toll on Littlewoods' pools operations, while the retail chain is seriously underperforming. Littlewoods' faces many problems, not least how to attract the right management. Certain members of the family, understandably, want to be able to cash in their chips. That said, Littlewoods does not live with the pressure of City analysts and the like jabbering about growth.

Amec forecasts 39% rise

Amec, the UK construction company under siege from a £360 million takeover bid by Kvaerner, of Norway, has forecast a 39 per cent rise in operating profits for the year to December 31.

It said pre-tax profits would remain static at £20 million after an £11.5 million charge against a contract settlement. The dividend is to be held for the fourth year running at 3p.

T&N victory

T&N shares yesterday soared 35p to 165p after a US court threw out a claim for $185 million from Chase Manhattan Bank over the installation of asbestos in its New York headquarters. T&N hopes the decision means an end is nigh to US property claims over asbestos, although the group still faces US health cases and legal action in Britain.

Devro boost

Devro International, the producer of sausage casings, is raising £31 million from shareholders to part-fund its £185 million acquisition of Teepak, an American rival. Devro, which gained the necessary regulatory approval for the deal earlier this week, is raising the funds through a placing and one-for-ten open offer of 13.5 million shares at 230p. The shares advanced 12p to 251p.

Fuller figures

Real ale drinkers helped Fuller, Smith & Turner, the London brewer, to battle against the move to lager in the summer and push up beer volumes by 9 per cent. The company lifted pre-tax profits to £5.07 million from £4.15 million in the six months to September 30. The interim dividend, payable on January 18, was raised 10 per cent to 2.92p per A share and 0.292p per B share.

Construction 'catastrophe' as output falls again

BY JANET BUSH, ECONOMICS CORRESPONDENT

THE output of the British construction industry fell by 1 per cent in the third quarter, leaving levels of activity only 1 per cent higher than the trough seen in the middle of 1993. The figures were described as catastrophic by The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors.

Simon Pott, president of the RICS, said: "These figures show the full extent of the catastrophe that has hit the construction industry. Output is now at its worst level since the depths of the last recession."

Mr Pott called on the Government to act quickly to boost the effectiveness of the Private Finance Initiative in attracting capital for investment in building.

Failure to do so runs the risk of a depressed construction sector dragging down the whole economy, he said. Mr Pott also called for an early cut in interest rates to boost confidence in the housing market.

Construction has now been declining for three consecutive quarters following five successive quarters of improvement, according to the Department of the Environment. Construction output in October was 2 per cent below the level achieved in the third quarter of 1994.

The total volume of new work was down 2 per cent on the second quarter and 5 per cent on a year ago. Private housing work was 13 per cent lower than last year while public housing and infrastructure were both 8 per cent down. The private industrial sector was healthier, 19 per cent up on the same period last year.

The seasonally adjusted number of employees in employment in October was down 2 per cent compared with last year.

☐ Unemployment in America edged up to a rate of 5.6 per cent in November. There was a 166,000 rise in non-farm payrolls, slightly weaker than Wall Street had expected.

In addition, October's originally reported rise of 116,000 jobs was revised down to a gain of only 66,000, reflecting a decline in manufacturing jobs.

The figures were regarded as weak enough to support the argument for a rate cut after the December 19 meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee. The Treasury bond market seemed to take this view with the benchmark long bond up a full point after the figures.

Other figures out yesterday included the fastest rise for three months in stocks of unsold goods on wholesalers' shelves in October. Total inventories rose by 0.7 per cent, the largest monthly increase since July.

Sales of new homes dropped for the third month in a row to the weakest level for five months in spite of lower interest rates. Sales fell 2.7 per cent in October after a decline of 1 per cent in September and a slump of 10.5 per cent in August.

Sale lifts Courts at half time

COURTS, the home furnishings retailer, relied on growth in Jamaica, Malaysia and Singapore, together with the profit from a share disposal to lift pre-tax profits from £5 million to £8.9 million in the six months to October 1 (Sarah Bagnall writes).

The company, whose chairman is Paul Cohen, made an exceptional profit of £4.8 million on the reduction of its holding in a Singapore subsidiary from 58.7 per cent to 51.05 per cent.

Stripping out the one-off gain, pre-tax profits slipped from £4.5 million to £4 million. Turnover rose 10.4 per cent to £137.2 million.

The interim dividend, due April 12, was lifted from 2p to 2.1p and is being paid out of earnings of 20.89p a share, up from 11.1p last time. The shares rose 10p to 748p.

Laporte shares slump after profits warning

BY ALASDAIR MURRAY

SHARES in Laporte, the specialist chemical company, collapsed 189p to a year low of 613p after the company issued a profits warning.

Laporte said full-year profits would be around 10 per cent lower than the £123.5 million recorded last year and said it will take an £85 million exceptional charge to cover a restructuring programme. The final dividend will be held at 20.7p, after an 8 per cent increase at the half-year.

The company blamed a downturn in chemicals for the construction and bulk polymer industries, continuing poor performance in water technology and harsh trading conditions in Australia and South America.

Laporte also reported a reduction in pension credit from £5.3 to £3 million and a £1.5 million decline in non-trading revenues as a result of its withdrawal from the Interox joint ventures. There was a £5 million rise in interest charges.

The £85 million provision includes a £5 million write-off following the disposal of four subsidiaries in the autumn.

Jim Leng, the chief executive appointed in August, said benefits of the restructuring programme would begin to be felt next year. Just six weeks ago, Laporte had pleased the City with a 14 per cent rise in half-year profits to £67 million. Until yesterday's warning, the company was expected to post full year profits of around £140 million.

Forte reveals more questions than answers

Investors want to know more on the demerger, says Eric Reguly

Forte's defence document, published yesterday, lacked information about the proposed demerger of the company's restaurants business. What investors really want to know is how debt will be shared between old and new Forte, the assets they will hold and who will run them.

With these questions unanswered it comes down to a matter of faith. Should investors give Forte's top team of Sir Rocco Forte, chairman, Sir Anthony Tennant, deputy chairman, and Keith Hamill, finance director, the benefit of the doubt and blame the lingering effects of the recession for the shares' poor return? Or should they believe that Forte, as Granada argues, is guilty of year after year of mismanagement?

Certainly, Forte's charts paint a dismal picture, especially compared with Granada's. Since 1990, Forte's shares underperformed Granada's by 40 per cent against the FT-SE all-share index and earnings per share in 1995 were still below their 1991 levels, while Granada's have climbed every year.

While Sir Rocco Forte, could have done more to squeeze profits from the group's assets during that period, there is little doubt that the worst is behind him. A recent Arthur Andersen study of 17 luxury hotels in the London, including several in the Forte portfolio, presents an encouraging picture. In the year to September 30, average room rates climbed 10 per cent to £153, occupancy rates 1.2 per cent to 75 per cent and room yields 9 per cent to £115.

The trend should continue, backing Sir Rocco's claim that it would have been foolish to have sold his hotels a couple of years ago. Yesterday Forte predicted pre-tax profits of £185 million in the year to January 31, 1996, up 46 per cent on the previous year. If Gerry Robinson, Forte's counterpart at Granada, is the value hunter he says he is, why didn't he bid at the bottom of the market?

Such questions, of course, are academic because £3.3 billion is on the table now and it represents a premium of more that 20 per cent to Forte's market value on the day before the bid's launch. While the premium may be tempting, especially to those institutions which need to bolster portfolio returns, it does not constitute a knock-out blow and may even be mean if you believe a turnround has just begun.

There seems little doubt that Granada will have to raise its bid. If the final offer is significantly higher there would appear to be no contest. At that stage the dilemma for Forte investors will be whether to take the cash, or go for the shares and cash option. The latter may present a fairly inexpensive way of buying into Granada.

A WORKING WEEK FOR: PETER BAMFORD

Fighter who books himself an early start

One of Britain's leading retailers relishes the challenges he faces in retaining a share of a competitive market, says Sarah Bagnall

JAMES MORGAN

Peter Bamford among the books at the WH Smith store in Sloane Square, London. "The only way you know what's going on is by visiting the branches"

riday

PETER Bamford likes to rise early in the morning, enjoys a rapid pace of change and revels in facing a challenge. These three attributes stand him in good stead in facing the problems that beset WH Smith's retail chain, of which he is managing director.

The 400-strong chain is struggling to regain its foothold in the fiercely competitive and fast moving retail market. The appeal of Smith has waned in recent years and customers have drifted away. And it has failed to tempt the nine million who do tramp through its stores each week to part with enough cash.

The company is caught in a vice. On the one hand it is losing sales to specialist retailers, like Waterstones and Our Price (which are part of the same group), while bearing down on the other side are the empire-building supermarket chains which are increasingly encroaching on Smith's natural terrain of magazines and newspapers, books and videos.

The result was a slump in last year's profits from from £77.2 million to £65 million, forcing the Smith group to announce its first fall in profits since 1980.

Bamford, 41, who took over the managing director's mantle nearly two years ago, says he likes a challenge. "I probably would get a bit bored if there wasn't lots to do. I and my team are very motivated to see WH Smith back in the premier league," he says.

> "I would get a bit bored if there wasn't lots to do"

As part of the process of restoring the chain's battered fortunes Bamford has strived to inject as much flexibility into the company as possible. The method of achieving this was the freeing up of time. "Most people here would say there aren't enough hours in the day and days in the week," he says.

As a result Bamford instigated a brutal culling of meetings. All regular ones were closely scrutinised and those deemed to exist for no better reason than to hold a meeting were scrapped. "We were spending an awful lot of time in meetings. When you are trying to change at the speed we are this leaves you with very little flexibility," he says.

If last week is anything to go by the drive has worked. Bamford only had seven meetings, of which two were with City analysts and hence are rare features in his diary. Four months ago his diary looked very different. "I used to have a whole series of one to one regular meetings with my immediate team. We struck those from the diary and we now talk as required," says Bamford.

A key feature of Bamford's week is the highly structured start to his day. An early riser, Bamford usually leaves his home near Cheltenham at about 6.30am and reaches his Swindon office by 7am. "I'm at my best first thing in the morning. The hours from seven and nine are absolutely critical," he says. The first hour is spent sorting through his post, completing paperwork and putting things in order. This is followed by up to an hour with his secretary, Sally, to ensure both can operate effectively and efficiently during the day with the minimal interruption.

"It may sound as if my day is extremely structured. But I don't think that's the way I work. There is a certain amount of work to allow informality and lack of structure to exist. Smith's culture historically has been rather formal but it's important that we do have informality and flexibility to enable us to move and respond quickly and that requires us to create the space to be able to do it."

There are no shortage of issues demanding mangement time and one of the most pressing recently was the end of the net book agreement. Bamford's flexible format was put to the test when two leading publishers pulled out of the NBA. This forced Smith to respond swiftly to counter a possible flood of discounted books on the market, a potentially serious threat to Smith where books account for a quarter of total sales.

Smith's resulting book promotion of up to 40 per cent off a wide range of bestselling books was put together at enormous speed. In the space of ten days it moved from conception of an idea to implementation in the stores.

It is this rapid pace of change Bamford relishes. "The parts I enjoy most are those things where we identify a new opportunity or a different way of doing something. We get commitment from people to do it, people come up with ideas and solutions and then to see it happen, and happen quickly. Its when you go in to our shops and you see something and you say: 'We did that, we made that happen'. Then if it works and customers respond to it that's the ultimate," he says.

Bamford has been a retailer most of his working life. After a false start as a mechanical engineer he joined Fine Fare, the food retailer. "A job I suppose I fell into," he admits. Then followed stints at Tesco and Woolworths before joining Smith in 1987. His jobs with the first three employers were in marketing and merchandising but when he moved to Smiths he changed direction. His role was to identify business opportunities overseas. Music in America was targeted and Bamford moved to America to set up and run a chain of music shops.

"It was about as exciting an opportunity as you could get. To go to a new country with a clean sheet of paper and start a business," recalls Bamford.

He and his wife, Carey, stayed in America for five years, during which time their two children Rachel, six, and Neil, three, were born. Bamford met his wife at a tea-tasting at Tesco. This weekly event involved up to 30 bowls of tea lined up ready to be sipped, swirled around the mouth and then spat out. All well and good but the tea has to be cold in order to get the flavour.

Bamford, who has a penchant for racing cars and owns an E-type Jaguar, returned to the UK in February 1994 to take over the reins of the retail chain. This October he was elevated to the main board. He admits he works hard. "From some people's point of view I am obsessive and driven but I have a balance. I do get into the office very early in the mornings but I try like hell to get out by about 6.30 at night so that I can help put my children to bed," he says.

He is keen to stress the point and continues earnestly: "The question is not how much time you spend at work but how much investment you put into your family when you are with them. I think that I put just as much energy and effort into my family as I do into work. I could be out almost every evening of the week on something related to work if I wanted to be. But I'm pretty tough about restricting that to one, absolute maximum two, evenings a week. I think it's very important. I won't say I never take work home because the nature of the job is such that sometimes you have to and I won't say I don't think about work at the weekend. But to me it's about making sure you put as much energy into home, and children and family as you do into your job no matter how long you spend at work."

The results of Bamford and his team's hard work are in the process of being revealed. Christmas is crucial for retailers and Smith is no exception with nearly 30 per cent of sales rung up on tills in the final two months of the year. Bamford spends one or two days a week visiting stores in the run-up to Christmas, compared with two or three days a month at other times of the year.

"It's simply keeping absolutely in touch with the market place. Knowing what we are doing versus what our competitors are doing. It's seeing what's selling — what isn't selling and picking up on things that can be passed on elsewhere," he says.

One lesson he learnt recently was that a number of branches had inadequate display space for the Christmas ranges. "For any retailer the only way you really know what's going on in the business is to visit the branches."

It's too early to tell whether Bamford is on his way to lifting the average spend of a Smith's customer from about £4.50 to above the £5 mark but Bamford is confident he will succeed. "People may say WH Smith is a bit tired but underneath all of that it has huge strengths to it. There is no question. We think we can do it," says Bamford.

HIDDEN ASSETS

First-class sports facilities pay their way at Bank of England

Joanna Pitman on how an institution is making the most of its resources

Sound planning, it appears, has been as bountiful to the staff of the Bank of England's bodies and purses as to their combined intellects. Above the ears, the Bank's staff are strictly grey matter: below the ears, if they are making full use of their hidden assets, they ought to be as lithe and taut as turned steel.

This is because one of the perks, or compensations, for the responsibility of maintaining the nation's monetary and financial stability, is use of the Bank of England Health Club, 41 acres of land packed with sports facilities on Priory Lane, Roehampton.

Bad luck if you live on the other side of London or if you work for the Bank's Essex printing plant or if you are one of the 300 staff members scattered around the country. But for those of the more than 2,000 London-based staff who live near Roehampton, the £30 annual membership offers use of six hard tennis courts, 18 grass courts, football pitches, rugby pitches, netball courts, a cricket pitch as well as a 20-metre indoor pool, gymnasium, sauna, steam room and aerobics exercise room.

The Bank bought the site and built the club in 1908, and current members have fond memories of recent historic sporting highlights. Chief among these is the occasion when the England football team trained there before they went out to win the 1966 World Cup.

The club hosts the England rugby team for training and sees international football teams use the facilities. In the summer, the qualifying rounds for the Wimbledon tennis championship are held there. And next June, the club will host the World Junior championships.

The Bank also fields eight teams in the Southern Amateur Football League, three rugby teams, five cricket teams, two netball teams and a range of men's and women's tennis teams.

While the vast majority — about 80 per cent — of the club's 5,500 members are either currently employed by the Bank, are retired employees or are family members, the club has begun to develop its facilities along commercial lines in recent years. Four neighbourhood schools and one disabled children's school pay to use the club as their sports ground. The club has also established the tradition of holding an annual sports day for 2,000 primary schoolchildren.

Bank of England staff grappling with the baffling intricacies of the effect on inflation of the PSBR are advised to stay away during that festival of excess, energy and excitement.

But they are also slightly restricted on week-day mornings. Hoping a relaxing dip in the pool might clear the mind of the detritus of the night before's Christmas party, one Bank employee found the pool occupied by a large proportion of the 200 schoolchildren who use it from nine to 11 every weekday morning. He scurried back to the tranquillity of his desk.

The Bank of England announced a restructuring programme in July last year, which involved a small reduction in staff numbers to 4,300. It led to the amalgamation and streamlining of various functions, including the rationalisation of the International and Economics divisions as a single entity within the Monetary Stability wing.

The changes have highlighted the responsibilities of the Bank to manage its resources in the most efficient and productive way possible. This is presumably why commercial realities are being encouraged at the Bank of England Health Club and why our esteemed central banker might conceivably be forced to slalom between 200 small children if he chose to go for a swim. That at least is one incentive to go straight to work every morning.

The Bank of England sports ground is much more than just an employees' perk

STOCK MARKET  MICHAEL CLARK

Bulls lose heart as the Dow and economy falter

MONDAY could see the equity market testing the resistance levels around 3,600 after another lacklustre performance this week.

The FT-SE 100 index managed to halve earlier losses, ending the session with a deficit of 9.5 points at 3,630.0, a fall on the week of 50.4. Trading conditions were again thin yesterday, with just 666 million shares recorded.

The opening fall on Wall Street overnight and its inability to take advantage of some weaker than expected US payroll numbers, left investors in London with the feeling that New York's record breaking-run may be over for the time being, at least.

The hesitancy on the part of domestic investors this week also reflects the uncertainty over the outlook for the British economy.

The forecast of 3 per cent growth by Kenneth Clarke, the Chancellor, is regarded as unobtainable. Many institutions take the view that pleas for a cut in interest rates when he meets Eddie George, Governor of the Bank of England, next week, will fall on deaf ears. The Governor has already made his views on the subject known.

One of the biggest falls on the day was seen in Laporte, the chemicals distributor, which saw its shares plunge 173p to 610p after a profits warning. The group said a downturn in its chemical operations during the second half would result in pre-tax profits for 1995 falling from £123.5 million to around £110 million.

Brokers had originally pencilled in a figure of £130 million-plus. There would also be a write-off of £85 million over restructuring. The final dividend will be held at 14.5p.

Forte was unmoved at 338½p after publishing its defence document. Brokers complained it offered little fresh information for shareholders. It continued to urge them to reject Granada's £3.4 billion bid and forecast a rise in pre-tax profits of 46 per cent to £185 million.

Forte has already promised to sell the group's stake in the Savoy Hotel and demerge its restaurant operations. The speculators are now looking for Granada's Gerry Robinson to come back with a higher offer. Granada fell 11p to 634p, matching the price at which its offer has been underwritten.

T&N rose after Chase Manhattan's claim was rejected

T&N, the engineering group, allowed itself a brief pause for celebration after learning overnight that a US jury had rejected a claim for compensation from Chase Manhattan Bank. The bank had demanded compensation from T&N relating to the asbestos installed during the construction of its New York headquarters.

Chase Manhattan had maintained that T&N had always known about the dangers of installing the substance, a claim denied by T&N. The shares finished 35p higher at 165p.

BSkyB, the satellite broadcaster, appeared to recover some of its poise with a rise of 16½p to 418½p. The group has announced plans to introduce a number of new stations covering arts, education, computers and a games channel. This comes just months after it launched six news channels.

BSkyB shares were undermined last week by the news that the Office of Fair Trading had launched an inquiry following complaints from cable companies about the company's pricing strategy.

Impressive figures from Sage Group, the computer software specialist, continued to underpin the share price, which climbed 22p to 338p. This was in spite of the fact that one institutional investor unloaded a parcel of almost three million shares at 340p. The price has come up from the 250p mark in the past ten days.

Official dealings in the National Grid begin on Monday. Fund managers are looking for an improvement in the price quoted on the "grey market" during the past few weeks which closed on Friday at 208½p.

Its inclusion as a constituent of the FT-SE 100 index is certain to attract the attention of the index tracker funds. Brokers expect the price to open at around the 215p level.

There was further misery for another company which has lost its place as a FT-SE 100 constituent this week. Inchcape eased a further 4½p to 206½p. Its shares have fallen more than 100p in the past month following a profits downgrading by UBS, the broker.

It looks as though Ashanti Goldfields has been mopping up more shares in Cluff Resources, after earlier this week making an agreed £80 million takeover. By the close of business last night, almost seven million shares had changed hands in a thin market as the price firmed 2p to 106p.

The market had several rights issues to digest. Devro International has confirmed it is raising £31 million on the basis of a one-for-10 open offer and placing at 230p.

The proceeds will be used to help to finance the acquisition of Teepak International for $133.5 million. An upbeat statement on current trading by Devro helped its shares to close 12p better at 251p.

Ransomes is also raising £37.3 million via a one-for-one at 48p in order to reduce debt. The rights issue co-incided with full-year figures showing pre-tax profits up 51 per cent at £9.2 million. The shares marked time at 64p.

☐ GILT-EDGED: Investors experienced volatile trading conditions throughout the session.

After clawing back early falls, prices moved sharply higher across the spectrum following publication of weaker than expected US non-farm payroll numbers. But the market was unable to hold its best levels and came off along with US treasury bonds later in the session.

A general absence of sellers meant that much of yesterday's business was focused on the futures pit, where the March series of the long gilt future traded in limits of £111 and £110 before settling £11/32 lower at £110 5/32. A total of 59,000 contracts were completed.

Among conventional issues Treasury 8 per cent 2013 fell £11/32 to £102¾, while at the shorter end Treasury 8 per cent 2000 drifted £⅛ to £104 23/32.

The Jim Leng effect

NEWS of the appointment of Jim Leng as chief executive of Laporte sent shareholder pulses racing last summer. Expectation of a repetition at Laporte of the Low & Bonar recovery — profits doubled in three years under his tenure — caused Laporte's share price to bound ahead and the one-day price surge of 30p allowed pundits to put a £60 million value on Mr Leng's expected contribution to the company. He has indeed caused a whirlwind at the speciality chemicals company, but the initial goodwill appears to have been premature. His first public act on joining Laporte has been to reduce the market value of the company by £330 million.

Investors should not complain to Mr Leng about yesterday's trading statement and restructuring provision; he would doubtless say that omelettes cannot be made without breaking eggs. Questions might be addressed to the rest of the board who delivered a particularly bullish outlook in September, a period when commodity chemicals manufacturers were feeling the effects of destocking. Laporte gave scant reference to such matters then, but yesterday's statement squarely blames the anticipated profits shortfall on weak demand for construction chemicals and a volume decline in catalysts.

The whole package means that Laporte is probably 18 months behind market expectations of growth, with forecast profits of £140 million next year now due in 1997. The restructuring seems sensible; it will cut costs by reducing the number of small plants. However, it is disturbing to see such a spring-cleaning job at a company that appeared so free of black spots.

Ransomes

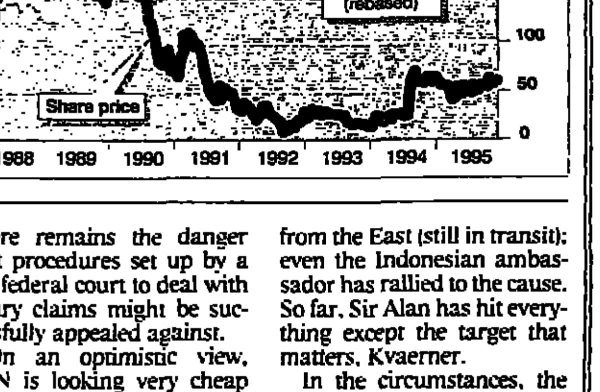

RANSOMES, best known for its grass-cutting machinery, has pulled through, although there were moments over the past five years when many thought it would not make it.

In 1989, the company paid $150 million for an American company and saddled itself with gearing of 700 per cent just as its markets were heading downhill. Some debt has been repaid and its bankers have blessed the company's restored profits with reduced interest rates.

New management has raised operating margins to 14 per cent on commercial lawnmowers and some good orders have been secured in the US, its main market. Attention is now being focused on consumer products, where production is to be reorganised under new managers. Lower gearing — the rights issue money reduces the ratio from 400 per cent to 59 per cent — gives Ransome the funds to expand the business with new products and markets.

The company has so far made little headway in the Japanese market, where the national golfing obsession offers opportunities. What Ransome needs is a less seasonal business. Most grass-cutting equipment is sold in early Spring, leaving Ransome's plants relatively inactive for half of the year.

After the rights, Ransome looks reasonably safe and, assuming it can maintain the American sales momentum, there should be good profits growth this year.

T&N

ONE day the T&N share price will find itself buffeted by the fortunes of the motor sector rather than the vagaries of the American legal system.

They are not quite there but yesterday the company won a substantial victory when a jury in New York dismissed a £120 million claim by Chase Manhattan over alleged asbestos contamination. Thus, a huge potential liability hanging over the T&N balance sheet has been removed and, even more important, the likelihood of further property-related claims succeeding has diminished.

However, T&N has not yet swept all the asbestos dust from its cupboards and the company is unlikely to release the extra provision of £100 million made last year on the strength of one court victory. The problem for companies like T&N is being able to quantify the claims. There remains the danger that procedures set up by a US federal court to deal with injury claims might be successfully appealed against.

On an optimistic view, T&N is looking very cheap with the shares trading on less than 10 times next year's earnings, 26 per cent below the market. However, the main issue is the cash drain from asbestos. With that in mind, the company needs to sharpen its working capital management. A company in T&N's position cannot afford to be cash consumptive.

AMEC

CONFIDENCE has been a feature of Sir Alan Cockshaw's seven-year tenure as chairman of AMEC. It was, therefore, disconcerting to see him on bended knee, begging shareholders to let him continue to run the company.

His bid defence strategy so far has been scattergun: an abortive bid for MacAlpine, a mysterious white knight from the East (still in transit); even the Indonesian ambassador has rallied to the cause. So far, Sir Alan has hit everything except the target that matters, Kvaerner.

In the circumstances, the defence document released yesterday was not a bad attempt to put AMEC's case. Sir Alec said the company was being "bullied" by the "mean" Kvaerner and was quite capable of offering greater value if it remained independent. But with no cash available, AMEC cannot produce the acquisitions or dividends shareholders would find truly persuasive.

Turnover will probably increase next year, but transforming that into profits depends on improving margins, and there are too many hypotheticals to guarantee that this will be achieved. Kvaerner remains in control of the bid war and it seems that Sir Alan will be left eating humble pie.

PENSIONS 30

Grim future for golden girls who took time out

WEEKEND MONEY

INVESTMENT 32

The winners and losers in a hard-fought league

Cash in on saving this Christmas

Presents of money may appeal to children's old-fashioned avarice, Anne Ashworth finds

A TSB survey shows that a significant percentage of families with two children expect to spend as much as £2,000 this Christmas. Parents who sigh at this news and fondly remember the simple presents of their youth, before the invention of Power Rangers, will be relieved to learn that there is an alternative. Nineties' children may no longer be satisfied with a stocking containing an orange and a jigsaw but presents of cash will appeal to their old-fashioned avarice.

The options include National Savings accounts, building society accounts and unit and investment trust savings schemes. Children who want to be Antiques Roadshow experts when they grow up might also be pleased with an item to start a collection.

Since children, like adults, are entitled to a personal tax allowance of £3,525 a year, (the threshold at which tax becomes payable), all the interest from their savings should come tax-free. The allowance increases to £3,765 in April.

Any capital gains should also escape tax as children enjoy an annual capital gains allowance of £6,000.

Tax at the rate of 25 per cent, falling to 20 per cent in April, is deducted from all bank and building society interest. But children can avoid this, provided they register the account to receive interest tax-free, using an Inland Revenue form R85. Copies should be available from banks and societies.

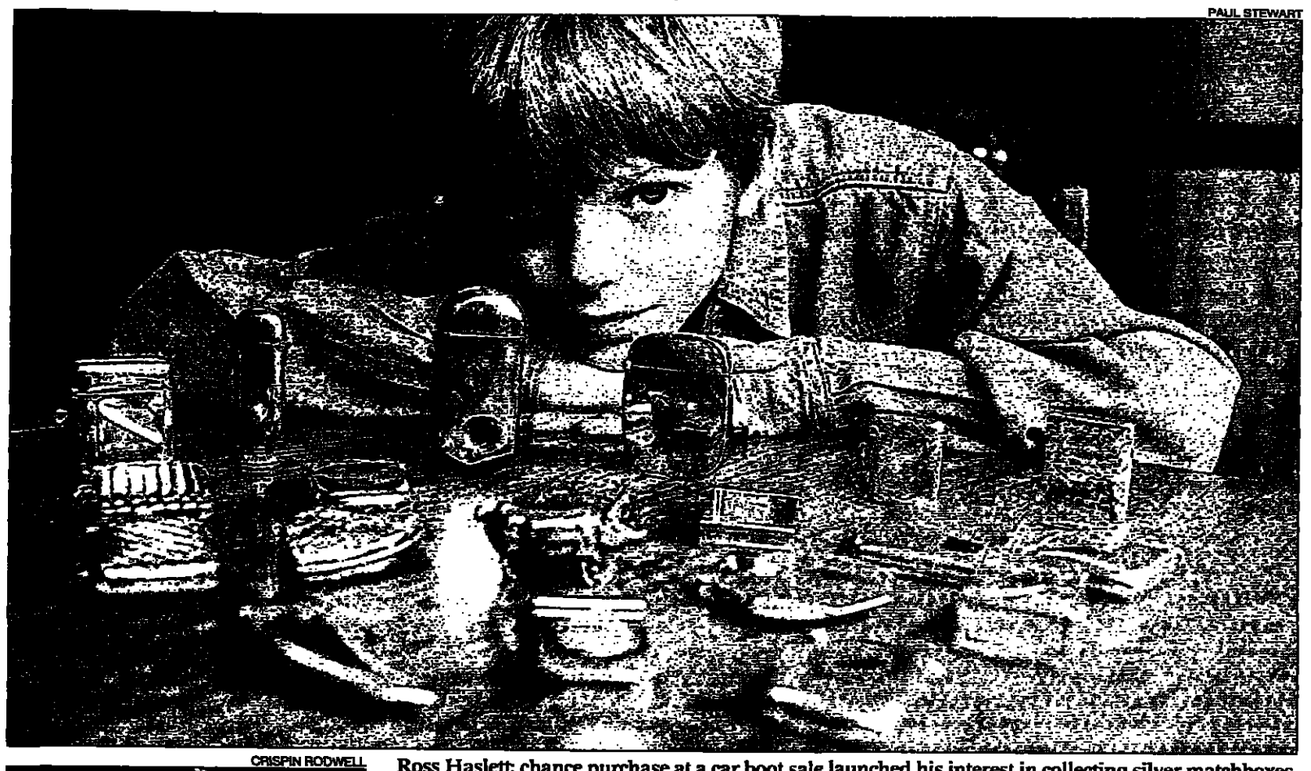

Parents who want to invest for their sons and daughters should be aware of the £100 rule, a piece of anti-avoidance legislation dating back to the Thirties. Any income of more than £100 paid on money given by a parent to a child is taxed as the parent's income.

Mothers and fathers who believe that the Revenue will not discover that they are hiding away cash in junior's account should be aware that banks, societies and National Savings inform the Revenue of every penny of interest paid. A Revenue spokesman advises that a child's account yielding large amounts of interest could be investigated. You are required to tell the taxman if your child receives more than £100 worth of interest from your parental largesse.

Those who do not like form-filling will opt for National Savings, where several schemes, including Children's Bonus Bonds, are tax-free. The current Issue G of the bonds pays 7.85 per cent, if held for five years, more generous than even the best building society account for young savers. This rate includes the bonus of £4.57 per £25 unit given on the fifth anniversary of purchase. The minimum investment is £25, the maximum £1,000. Children who have the maximum holding of bonds from earlier Issues A to E can hold another £1,000 worth of Issue G. Anyone over 16 can invest on behalf of anyone under 16.

Only parents, grandparents and guardians can buy Premium Bonds for a child. Here the minimum investment is £100, the maximum £20,000. The monthly prizes (all tax-free) range from £50 to the £1 million jackpot. Bonds bought in December will enter the draw in February. Each bond has a 1 in 15,000 chance of winning a prize in each draw. A £100 holding would give you a one in 150 chance of winning something each month.

The one month's notice period for withdrawals from the Investment Account (minimum deposit £20, maximum £100,000) makes it a favourite among parents. Anyone can open an account for a child, but any withdrawals made from accounts of those under seven can only be authorised by the person "with the main responsibility for bringing up the child". The interest is paid gross, before the deduction of tax. The rate depends on the amount invested, ranging from 5.25 per cent to 6 per cent.

Christy Lamont: passion for thimbles

Investment that is child's play

Eleven-year-old Christy Lamont's grandparents bought her thimbles for Christmas a few years ago. The collection she then started includes a gold Victorian thimble worth £400. "They aren't that expensive to buy and she gets a lot of enjoyment out of them," says Lyn Lamont, Christy's mother. A silver thimble bought for £14.50 a couple of years ago was recently valued at £30.

Ross Haslett, 10, bought what he thought was a pocket watch at a car boot sale for 50p five years ago only to discover it was a tin Vesta box. It started his collection of 21, now worth £600. "I like them because they are different and not many people have them," he says. "My mum bought a gold one for dad, which I'll get one day, but she says she would never have bought it if I hadn't started collecting them."

Antique dealers do not encourage investment buying but, with a little guidance, presents can be found that in years to come will be worth tenfold their price today.

Good condition in anything old holds the key to its value. Toys that are looked after are worth a small fortune. Justin Pressland, a collectables expert, advises people to buy two. "Toys are wonderful to invest in because they remind people of childhood. If kept in good condition, you get the investment, historical and nostalgic value," he says. Toys for the seven to 15 age group are the most valuable.

Today's toys which Mr Pressland thinks will be valuable in future, if kept in mint condition, include Action Man, limited-edition Barbies and anything linked with Thunderbirds or the new James Bond film. Toys made for Licence to Kill five years ago are now worth three times their £7.99 price, and Indiana Jones toys from the 1981 film Raiders of the Lost Ark, bought for under £5 are worth over £100.

Well-kept illustrated children's books complete with price and dustsheet are another good investment. A privately printed and inscribed copy of Beatrix Potter's Peter Rabbit was valued by Clive Fararher, an antiquarian bookseller, at £25,000. "It must be in good condition," he says. Comics and Rupert annuals are also going up in value: a 1936 Eagles annual can fetch up to £2,000, and Mr Fararher thinks the Enid Blyton market is on the brink of taking off.

First-edition Booker Prize winners are good buys, while Mr Fararher's Christmas investment tip is the hardback of George Orwell's Animal Farm, illustrated by Ralph Steadman.

Bigger rates for little people

Marianne Curphey shops around for best buys on the junior market

Small savers have suffered, like their elders, from the impact of falling interest rates. Christine Bayliss, investment editor of Moneyfacts, the savings information provider, said that over recent months societies had been cutting rates, with some now offering as little as 0.2 per cent.

The best rate is being offered by the Melton Mowbray Building Society, which has a Sunny Bond 30-day notice account for children with an interest rate of 7.1 per cent. The minimum investment is £250.

Next best is the Harpenden Building Society's 18 Club, an instant-access account that can be opened with just £5. It pays 6.75 per cent. No withdrawals are permitted until the saver's eighteenth birthday.

Among the big building societies, the best rate currently on offer is Skipton Building Society's Young Sovereign instant-access account, which pays interest yearly at 5.75 per cent on a minimum deposit of £25. The Coventry Building Society's interest account (minimum £1) pays 5 per cent.

Over the long term, however, investment and unit trusts are more likely to give you a better rate of return than savings accounts. However, their value fluctuates with the vagaries of the stock market and they should be held for at least five years. Investment and unit trusts act as funds in which savers' money is pooled and invested across a wide range of stocks and shares. Monthly savings schemes are offered by most trusts, allowing payments of as little as £25.

Some unit trust managers accept savers as young as 14 but most limit them to 18. But you can open an account for a child and act as a nominee to buy and sell units. You can approach the unit trust management company direct. You should expect to pay an initial charge on each account plus an annual management fee. When the child is old enough, he or she can claim the units by filling in a stock transfer form, a simple process that usually only involves a 50p stamp duty charge.

Mark Bolland, director of Chamberlain de Broë, the independent financial adviser, recommends a solid, reputable investment trust, with a savings scheme. Top of his list are funds from Foreign and Colonial, Edinburgh (managed by Dunedin) and Scottish Mortgage (managed by Bailley Gifford).

"F&C is a stable trust with an outstanding return. The savings scheme minimum contribution is as low as £25. Other good funds are the Edinburgh (monthly minimum £30), which now concentrates mainly on the UK stock market, and Scottish Mortgage (monthly minimum £30)."

Rise and fall of the bid kings

PERSONAL INVESTOR

GRAHAM SEARJEANT

What a bad week for conglomerates. On Monday, Williams Holdings told shareholders that its profits would be at the bottom end of the range of City forecasts. Its shares have been a dull performer all year. On Tuesday, BTR, now the biggest at a market value of £12 billion, offered the same message. This was not a dramatic profits warning, merely a tale of difficult markets: motor components and building in Europe, construction and polymers in the Pacific. BTR shares shed a further 4 per cent.

There was no obviously bad news from Hanson, the most famous and buccaneering of the breed. But the headlong six-month fall continued unabated, before some late relief. Although profits are forecast to rise, Hanson shares have fallen by around 15 per cent this year, while the FT-SE 100 share index has risen by 20 per cent. After a spectacular loss of favour, the market value of the 1980s paragon slipped below £10 billion. Worse, its shares yield more than 8 per cent in dividend. That is more for your money than fixed-interest gilt-edged stock, implying that the risk is greater than hopes of higher dividends.

This is bad news for index-tracking pension funds, which own a lot of these "diversified industrials". It is worse for many private investors. They tend to get stuffed, by well-meaning advisers, with great names that have grown vast and look good value after years of fancy ratings. Sadly, this good value is not always real. When big conglomerates lose momentum, the de-rating can be punishing to those left holding the baby.

As ever, timing is all. Takeover vehicles need many ingredients to get going, not least the drive and ambition of their promoters. To keep going, the sine qua non is that its shares must be rated higher than its various businesses would command in their own right. The conglomerate's management must add value. It may be a system of industrial management, such as the "BTR pack" that outsiders trust to deliver consistently high performance. More often it is corporate activity itself: the ability to generate rising earnings per share from well-judged bids and sales, preferably financed by highly rated securities.

The more successful a conglomerate, the higher its rating and the greater its capacity to succeed. This golden circle allows skilfully led vehicles to accelerate from small beginnings to become giants. But it can turn into a vicious circle. The bigger the underlying businesses, the harder it becomes to outperform their industry. The bigger the group, the bigger the takeovers it needs to keep up the value added by bids and deals. Hanson got to the stage where it needed frequent ICI-sized bites.

The process then unwinds. The conglomerate's rating sinks towards the price to earnings ratios that markets put on the businesses it owns. That makes it ever harder to make immediately profitable bids. At Hanson, to make matters worse, markets fear that the loss of bid-power may unwind other tax and accounting aids to profits.

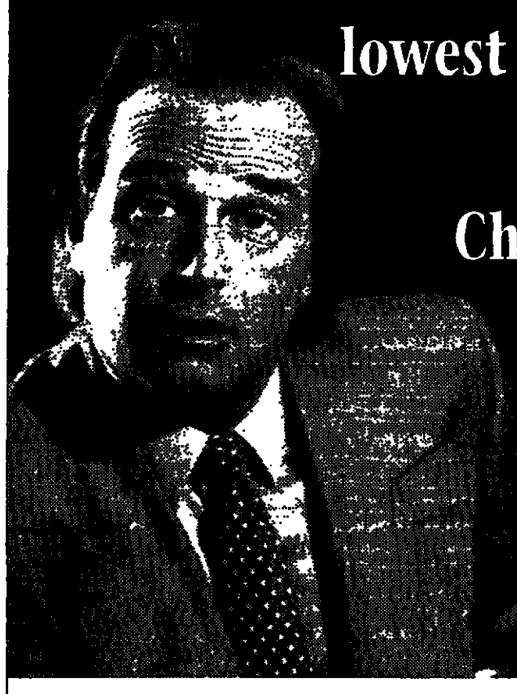

In the worst case, being an unwieldly conglomerate becomes a negative, making the company worth less than its parts. Its life cycle — often coinciding with the generation that built it — is then over. New lions will rip it apart via a break-up bid.

To renew itself, BTR is undergoing its own massive sort-out under a new chief executive from outside the famous five who built it. BTR, like Hanson, wants to emerge as a simpler more coherent group that can generate more growth internally. Like Williams, however, it is more at the mercy of economies it operates in. Back along the cycle, Tomkins has regained a good rating and still has big takeover ambitions. Further back still, Granada, though already a big company, is accelerating skilfully along the conglomerate path, though raising City doubts on the way.

The real money is made by backing tomorrow's Hansons when they are small and priced outrageously. But most will not make it. Investors can only aim for the jackpot if they can afford to lose.

Lost generation of women find pensions future far from golden

Karen Zagor on the plight of women who gave up work to raise families and who will pay for it

CHANNEL 4

Life will not be quite as rosy as television's Golden Girls find it for those women trapped by our archaic state pensions law

Women who are reaching retirement age are discovering that their work life, as far as pension benefits are concerned, is being abruptly curtailed. "We are the lost generation of women," said a 59-year-old reader after receiving a letter from the Department of Social Security informing her that her official working life had ended in April. Though she will work on until 65, she can no longer make pension contributions.

"We only joined the workforce after our children started school. We started with part-time jobs with no pensions and, after years of fighting, got full-time jobs. We have to keep working beyond 60 to make up for the years we were at home, yet cannot choose to keep contributing to our pensions after 60," she said.

Another reader, Brenda Jenkinson, worked for 22 years before retiring on 54 per cent of the single person's basic pension. She has now discovered that when her husband reaches 65, her own basic pension will be cancelled and she will receive the spouse's pension entirely through her husband's National Insurance contributions.

"I would have received this without ever having gone out to work," she said. "I shall have lost the right to benefit from the hard-earned money I paid into the National Insurance fund because my pension will be regarded as an 'overlapping benefit'." She added: "I see nothing "overlapping" about my contributions. These were separate and stood alone."

The pension rules for these women belong to a world that no longer exists. At the same time, there is little provision for the generation of women who never dreamt, in their teens and twenties, that they would need to worry about careers or pensions for themselves. The DSS is inching towards pensions equality for women, but in the process a generation of working women is falling through the cracks. Cathleen Mainds, financial adviser at Fiona Price & Partners, said: "It's like so many things, the regulations have taken a long time to catch up with the way things are. Women are suffering from the assumption that it would be the man who was the breadwinner and that the wife would participate in his pension. If a woman has reached retirement age without any other provision for it, there is very little she can do."

The state pension system is a product of an age when women were expected to stop work to keep house and raise children after getting married. Originally, working married women paid reduced contributions. This meant they were not entitled to full sickness, unemployment and disability benefits if they had to stop work. The move to allow married women to pay full contributions was a move towards equality. At the same time, the Government has acknowledged many women spent too long out of the workforce to accrue a worthwhile pension and allowed married women to receive a pension linked to their husband's contributions.

Perhaps the biggest problem for both men and women is that as the state pension is worth so little these days, alternative sources of income are crucial if you want to live in even modest comfort.

STATE PENSIONS

EVERYONE is entitled to a basic state pension, but it does not add up to much. A full basic pension is £3,060.20 a year for a single person and £4,893.20 for a married couple. Married couples do not get the larger pension automatically, they must claim for the wife's portion.

To qualify for a full basic pension, a woman would need to have worked or received credits for 90 per cent of her full working life. For state pensions, working life starts at 16. So a woman retiring now would have a full working life of 44 years. As the age of retirement for woman is lifted to 65, the number of years needed to receive a full pension will ultimately rise to 49 years for all women born after 1955. Since home responsibilities protection was introduced in 1978, a woman can receive credit towards her pension if she is receiving child benefit. She may also be eligible for credit if she is staying home to look after someone, such as a disabled relative.

All married women are entitled to a pension based on their husband's National Insurance contributions. Working wives can choose the bigger of their own pensions or their share of their husband's, equivalent to about 60 per cent of the single person's pension. Divorced or separated women can still claim a portion of their husband's pension. They lose this right if they remarry.

SERPS

ANYONE who has paid National Insurance contributions is entitled to a state earnings related pension (Serps) based on their working life, in addition to the basic state pension. The average Serps for women is £11.43 a week, adding just over £594 a year to a basic pension. It is possible to contract out of Serps, allowing your own National Insurance contributions and those of your employer to fund a personal pension. Advisers recommend contracting out of Serps for most women under 40.

If you decide to work beyond state retirement age, you can defer your pension for up to five years or receive it while working. You will be taxed on the pension, so it is important to make sure your pension income does not push you into a higher tax bracket.

COMPANY PENSIONS

This is usually the best way to save for retirement, especially if your employer makes additional contributions. Company schemes vary, but most will base your pension on two-thirds of your final salary and will require 40 years' service for the maximum pension. Women who took time out of work and are nearing retirement age should consider making additional voluntary contributions into an employer-sponsored scheme. This will be separate from the company plan, but a good employer will negotiate reduced charges for its AVC plans.

Another option is to make free-standing additional voluntary contributions. Charges will probably be higher than on the AVC schemes, but you will have a wider choice of plans and will be able to continue making contributions if you change jobs. There is a 15 per cent ceiling for pension contributions, including those in the company scheme. Public-sector employees may also be able to buy additional years in an employer's pension plan.

PERSONAL PENSIONS

THESE should be considered carefully by anyone who does not expect to have an adequate company pension such as the self-employed and those with unorthodox careers. Depending on your age, you can put between 17.5 per cent and 40 per cent of your gross earnings into a personal pension, reducing your taxable earnings accordingly. The investment income is tax free, so a personal pension plan should grow more quickly than a standard investment. In some instances, your employer may be able to make payments into your personal pension. It is estimated that women who take time off work to raise children would have to put up to 50 per cent more than a man into a pension to achieve the same benefits as men.

There have been problems with mis-selling personal pensions in recent years. Personal pensions are investment vehicles, and like any investment it is important to do research, and perhaps take professional advice, before parting with your money.

A QUESTION OF MONEY

Be ready to cover that long illness

Insurance policies that pay a regular income if you become too ill to work have become more affordable after the announcement in the Budget that the payments will be tax free from next April. At present, only about one in ten people is covered by permanent health insurance (PHI) or income-replacement policies as they are also known. But insurers are now hoping that sales will rise as a result of the change.

Q Why do I need permanent health insurance?

A The chances of suffering long-term illness before reaching retirement are relatively high. Yet the amount you can claim from the State to tide you over is very limited. Earlier this year, the Government cut back sickness benefits and made them harder to obtain. After a year off work through sickness, you would currently receive £58.85 per week in incapacity benefit. Only a minority of employers provide sick pay over and above the statutory minimum. A period off work because of sickness can therefore result in severe financial problems. With a PHI policy, you can get a regular replacement income until you recover or reach normal retirement age.

Q How will the Budget change affect the cost of PHI?

A At present, if you want your insurer to pay you an annual income of, say, £10,000, you have to insure about £14,000 to get the benefit you want after basic-rate tax has been deducted. Since payments will be tax free after April 6 next year, all you now need to insure is the actual income you require of £10,000. According to Friends Provident, this means that a 35-year-old man who wants this income starting after 13 weeks until age 65 will in future have to pay only £32.30 per month, instead of £41.40 at present — a reduction of more than 20 per cent.

If you already have a policy and want to cut your costs after the change, ask your insurer to reduce your insured benefit. But before doing so, check that your cover is realistic. Many people forget to increase their cover as their income increases and end up underinsured.

Q What is the maximum income I can get from a PHI policy?

A Currently, you can receive an income of up to three-quarters of your earnings (less state sickness benefit) from a PHI policy if illness prevents you from working. Insurers imposed this upper limit because they wanted to ensure that policyholders had an incentive to return to work if they recovered. In fact, because PHI payments were taxed after 12 months, policyholders ended up with less than the maximum anyway.

Insurers are now worried that when payments become tax free, the incentive to return to work will be lessened. So they are currently considering lowering the maximum income they will pay to between 50 per cent and 60 per cent of earnings.

Q What happens if I am already receiving benefit?

A If you have been receiving payments from a personal PHI policy for more than 12 months, your insurer will be deducting basic rate tax at source from your benefits. This will continue to be the case until April 6 next year when the change comes into effect. After that date, your insurer will automatically pay you the full benefit without tax deducted.

Q Will my benefits be tax free if I am insured through an employer's PHI scheme?

A If you have PHI cover through a company scheme it appears there will be no change after the Budget. Normally, these schemes are paid for by employers who are able to set their premiums off against tax. They will continue to deduct tax from the benefits before handing them over to you. The maximum benefits under employer-funded schemes are typically two-thirds of earnings. Experts are unclear from the information so far released by the Inland Revenue what the position would be if employees contributed to the cost of the cover and whether that means part or all of the benefits could then be received tax-free.

Q If I want to take out my own PHI policy, how do I decide which is best?

A Two important points to look out for are whether your premiums are fixed or variable and how disability is defined. Some policies look cheap to start with, but insurers reserve the right to review and increase premiums. Choose a policy that pays out if you are unable to perform your own job, rather than one that pays out only if you are so disabled you are unable to perform any job. If you are offered a budget-priced plan, look at how long the benefits are paid and whether certain illnesses are excluded. One budget plan will not pay for muscular skeletal problems, such as backache, which is one of the commonest causes for permanent health claims.

Protection is in the cards

In the frantic Christmas crush, packages can get stolen, left behind, or broken. However, to save anyone from having to cancel Christmas, some credit card companies will reimburse customers the full cost of any goods stolen, lost or damaged accidentally over a specified period, usually 90-100 days.

Barclaycard, the first main credit card company to introduce purchase protection cover in 1990, expects the number of calls to its helpline to double to about 2,000 a month between December and January. Every year, the company pays out £1 million in claims.

Last year, one in five Barclaycard customers admitted to having lost a Christmas purchase. Cardholders are covered for any goods worth between £50 and £15,000 bought with a Barclaycard (fee £10). Cover extends to 100 days after purchase.

One recent claimant is Sharon Reeves, 23, an admissions assistant at the Royal Holloway College in Surrey, who was horrified when she spilt bleach on her new £60 party dress. Fortunately, Miss Reeves had purchased the dress with her Barclaycard and was able to make a claim, allowing her to buy a replacement outfit.

The Bank of Scotland introduced purchase protection cover in 1991 for its Classic Visa and Mastercard customers of up to £2,500 reimbursement per year on items between £25 and £500 for up to 100 days. The annual fee for both cards is £10. The Royal Bank of Scotland's new Gold Visa card (fee £35) offers between £25 and £3,500 purchase protection cover per year for up to 90 days after the loss. There is a £500 limit on each claim.

The Halifax Building Society gives up to 100 days' free cover for purchases between £50 and £15,000 per year on its Visa card (annual fee £10).

The Alliance & Leicester provides up to £5,000 cover within 100 days on its Visa credit card (fee £12) and Atlantic Visa card (fee £10). NatWest provides up to 90 days' purchase protection cover on its Gold Visa (fee £35) and Mastercard (fee £80) for purchases between £50 and £100,000.

National & Provincial's Visa card provides up to 90 days' purchase protection on items worth more than £50.

At the Midland, only the Gold Mastercard (first year free, then annual fee £70) and Gold Visa card (free then £35) offer purchase protection cover that extends to 90 days. The Gold Mastercard (first year free, then fee £70) provides up to £20,000 annual cover per cardholder, and the Gold Visa card (first year free, then fee £35) provides up to £3,500 cover.

■ Making a claim: Credit cardholders are reimbursed only if the amount is not recoverable under a home contents or travel policy. Customers are expected to produce a retailer's receipt and a sales voucher.

Spinster's long, lonely road to untold wealth

Anne Scheiber developed her own investment theories and progressed from tax office auditor to multi-millionaire

Richard Thomson on how one woman played the stock market to turn $5,000 into $22 million

She was so secretive that she was known only to a few professionals on Wall Street. She lived alone in a rent-controlled Manhattan apartment with the paint peeling from the walls and furniture she had not changed for 60 years.

She hardly ever took public transport, and lived on social security and her meagre pension in her old age. Yet by the time of her death last January at the age of 101, she had proved herself one of the most spectacularly successful stock market investors of all time.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the astonishing story of Anne Scheiber, the former tax office auditor who turned $5,000 into $22 million, is that she did it completely on her own. Between 1944, when she first invested her savings, until 1994, she produced an average annual return of 18.3 per cent. If she had put the same money into the Standard & Poor's 500 index, a popular US stock market measure, she would have made only $726,849 over the same period.

Her performance puts her in the same league as modern gurus such as the legendary Warren Buffett, known variously as the Sage of Omaha or The World's Greatest Investor.

But while Mr Buffett uses fancy analytical techniques, with minions to do his number crunching and a corporate jet to ferry him to meetings with the captains of US industry, Miss Scheiber had only her brains and the public library, while her studio flat served as an office. She began investing when Mr Buffett was barely out of school, and she developed her investment philosophy long before he did. Remarkably, however, their approach is almost identical.

"She was one of a kind," said Ben Clark, her attorney since the 1950s. "I never met anyone else like her."

Miss Scheiber was born into a relatively poor family of nine children in turn-of-the-century Brooklyn. Her father died young after large losses on his property holdings and her mother sold real estate to support the family. Miss Scheiber went to secretarial college, then studied book keeping and law before joining the Inland Revenue Service as an auditor.

She spent her whole career there but never received a promotion in spite of being one of the best in her department at ferreting out underpayments of tax. Her initial salary of $4,000 rose by only $400 in 23 years.

She blamed lack of advancement on the fact that she was Jewish and female. It is probably why she left her entire fortune to Yeshiva University, a Jewish university in New York, to provide scholarships for women.

> "She had no other interests, no friends, just her investing"

But her years at the IRS taught her that the stock market was the place to make real money. When she retired, she transformed herself into a full-time investor. "She had no other interests, no friends, just her investing," said Mr Clark.

Every day, she would walk from her apartment on 57th Street to the public library on 42nd Street and study the financial newspapers (she never bought them herself). On the basis of this research she evolved her own theory of the stock market, which professionals now call "value investing". She was not interested in whether the market as a whole was going up or down as long as the shares she chose were good ones over the long term.

The companies she selected tended to be ones with a healthy consumer business and a strong franchise, such as Coca-Cola and PepsiCo. She never bought more than 200 different shares over the years, never held much more than 100 at any one time, rarely sold and always reinvested her dividends. She also never bought second line stocks or flakey start-ups, but concentrated on big companies.

Once she had selected her investments she called Bill Fay, her broker at Merrill Lynch, and told him what to buy. She never asked for advice.

Her most spectacular investment was in Shering-Plough, the drug company in which she purchased 200 shares for under $10,000 around 1950. Thanks to stock-splits and share dividends over the years, this holding had become 60,000 shares, worth $4 million, by her death.

Other long-standing investments in her portfolio were Allied Signal, Coca-Cola, PepsiCo, Loews, Bristol-Meyers Squibb and Pfizer. She also liked entertainment companies, buying shares in Capital Cities/ABC, the television network, and Paramount.

Her investment philosophy has an eerie similarity to that which Mr Buffett has made famous. He, too, loves companies with a strong franchise, prefers to hold shares for many years and picks large companies rather than smaller ones.

The theory is that these companies generate huge amounts of cash, which keeps them financially sound and ensures handsome dividends (by the time of her death, Miss Scheiber's annual dividend income was more than $750,000). They also retain an enduring popularity with the public which ensures their future profitability. Not surprisingly, Miss Scheiber's and Mr Buffett's portfolios are remarkably similar.

The secret of this approach is that once an investment has been made, the investor must be patient. The returns take years, even decades, to accumulate. But as Miss Scheiber proved, the final result far outstrips any attempt to second guess which way the stock market may be going. It also makes most highly paid professional fund managers look like dullards.

Throughout her frugal life, Miss Scheiber never married and was estranged from the rest of her family. "She was not a happy person," said Mr Clark. "I never saw her smile. Unless you get love, you cannot give it, and I don't think she ever was loved."

In 1975, she arranged her own funeral and bought herself a bronze coffin, specially sealed to keep out worms. Little did she know it would be another 20 years before she would take up residence in it.

But if her $22 million fortune did not make her happy, at least she showed that you do not need a business degree and an entire company full of equity analysts to make money out of the stock market. If this story has a moral, it is that anyone can become fabulously wealthy from the market if they are sensible, methodical and, above all, patient.

Simpler tax rules, but for whom?

COMMENT

ANNE ASHWORTH
Personal Finance Editor

Did you fail to understand your notice of tax coding? Were you unable to spot which figure from the array of numbers on your last income tax assessment represented the amount that you actually owed the Inland Revenue? If you can answer "yes" to either of these questions, or have your own example of absolute fiscal confusion, then you should welcome an announcement to be made in Parliament next Tuesday. The Revenue will, at last, present a weighty paper setting out how it will simplify the tax system.

These deliberations will have little relevance to those who pay-as-they-earn. But the millions of self-employed and contract workers who bear the responsibility for their own tax affairs have a vested interest in seeing that the rules are clarified and made accessible. Self-assessment, which arrives in April 1997, will require that they all become conversant with the intricacies of Schedule D.

Even accountants, for whom the complications are a meal ticket, are calling for reform. As a prime instance of obfuscation, they cite the pages of legislation that explain how the married couple's allowance can be transferred from the husband to the wife. At most, this allowance is worth £258, the number of words being in indirect proportion to the value of the concession. This allowance is given at the 15 per cent rate of tax, another source of bewilderment for those who believed that there were only three rates of income tax, currently 20 per cent, 25 per cent and 40 per cent.

As simplification is such a gargantuan task, accountants suggest the Inland Revenue should limit its ambitions to providing commentaries to sections of taxation, explaining why the rules were made and how they work. Such a layman's guide would be useful today to the electricity shareholders who have received National Grid shares (see page 34). For unfathomable reasons hidden in the small print of the prospectus, these shares will be regarded as dividends. The Advance Corporation Tax regulations mean higher-rate taxpayers are likely to have an extra 20 per cent tax to pay.

Save the show

THE reaction of the financial services industry to the highly critical Which? survey on standards of service among investment advisers is easy to predict. The report's findings suggest that some insurance company tied agents unashamedly flout the regulations, failing, for example, to declare that they can only recommend their employer's products.

These lapses should inspire resolutions to do better in 1996. But past experience shows that they are more likely to take to consulting the casting directory Spotlight to check out whether a new client is actually an actor working for Which?

Posing as people with everyday financial problems, the Which? repertory company uncovered breaches of the most basic rules.

Independent financial advisers, however, emerged in an almost flattering light. This news should inspire those several thousand IFAs who are churlishly refusing to co-operate with the personal pensions mis-selling review, to stop delaying the process of justice.

The prompt payment of £4 billion compensation to the real-life victims of bad advice is the best way to improve the image of the whole industry.

The winners and losers in a hard-fought league

Robert Miller on the purge that will see six companies make their debut in the FTSE 100

No higher accolade can be bestowed on a company than to be elected to the FTSE 100 index of Britain's corporate giants.

A week on Monday, in one of the biggest purges since the index was established in 1984, six newcomers will make their debut when official stock market trading begins at 8.30am. As a foretaste, National Grid, the power transmission group being demerged from the regional electricity companies, will replace Inchcape, the international marketing and services group, on Monday.

A place in the Financial Times Stock Exchange 100 Index, commonly known as Footsie, confers more than mere corporate status. In practical terms, it means that the shares of the incoming company will have to be bought by unit trusts and pension funds that track the index and therefore invest in all 100 companies.

The raison d'être of a tracker fund is to try to match the performance of the benchmark FTSE 100 index. But fund managers have expenses to deduct, unlike the index itself. To overcome the charging handicap, managers set a target which can deviate within a narrow band on either side of the performance line. Generally, the number of shares held in each individual tracker portfolio will be in proportion to the weighting of each company in the index. But it is not all doom and gloom for those who are leaving the Footsie, according to Barry Holman, director of index funds at Legal & General, itself a member of the top 100 club. He says: "A few track just the FTSE 100. But the corporate pension funds and larger tracker trusts tend to be linked to the FTSE All Share index of just over 900 companies, so those who have just dropped out of Footsie will not necessarily be discarded." Nevertheless, in the short term, the share prices of companies on the way out have fallen.

Those on the demotion list apart from Inchcape are two regional electricity companies, London and Midland, whose exit is partly attributable to the National Grid demerger. Arjo Wiggins Appleton, the paper company, and De La Rue, the banknote and security printing company, have both given warnings of declining profits and Sears, the retailer, produced disappointing half-time results in September.

The other newcomers to the FTSE are Burton Group, which includes Debenhams and Top Shop, and Argos, Pilkington, the glass manufacturer based in St Helens, and Smiths, the aerospace to medical systems combine. Also coming in, at number 97, is Foreign & Colonial, the UK's oldest investment trust, which will join 3i, the largest trust, in the FTSE. F&C's flagship is all the more welcome because it brings with it more than 110,000 shareholders of whom over 50 per cent are private investors, compared with 20 per cent for companies generally. Michael Hart, chairman of F&C Management and the trust's manager expressed delight at joining the corporate hall of fame.

Mr Hart adds: "When launched in 1868 F&C's main objectives were 'to provide the investor of modest means the same advantages as the larger capitalists and also to provide these investors with a better return'. With its low, straightforward cost structure and excellent investment performance, the original objective is still as sound today as it was almost 128 years ago."

Another leading fund management group, Mercury, has been listed as a reserve in case any of the newcomers drop out before the next review on March 6. Others on the subs bench are Dixons, the electrical retailer, Anglian Water, MEPC, the property group, and Greenalls, the pubs and hotels group. As many private investors manage their own portfolios and have a heavy weighting of FTSE 100 companies taking a closer look at those striving to move from the reserve list to the first team might provide some extra performance impetus.

There are many companies outside of the FTSE that may provide better returns, but they will inevitably carry a higher degree of risk. As Mr Holman puts it: "The top 100 companies in the UK have a combined market capitalisation of £613 billion and account for 72 per cent of the total UK market value. The FTSE 100 and its performance is a measure of how the UK as a country is faring. There is a noticeable premium on the share price of those companies joining the elite just as there is a downside to those leaving it."

But it is not the end of the world to be dropped from the FTSE. Among the new entrants in the FTSE Mid 250 index, the markets second tier, is Cordiant, the advertising group. In its former life, it was a member of the top 100 until October 1, 1987. In those days, however, it was better known as the all-conquering Saatchi & Saatchi.

Newcomer signals new year confidence

The investment trust movement can look forward to the new year with confidence after M&G, the UK's oldest unit trust group, signalled on Thursday that it is to launch an investment trust in February. The fact that M&G is to launch an Equity Investment Trust in the sector will help to rekindle investors' enthusiasm.

TRUST WATCH

In the early 1990s when M&G, which has £13.5 billion under management, launched two trusts, Income and Recovery, they attracted £246 million and £130 million respectively. M&G's Equity Trust will have no initial charge and no withdrawal fee. However, there will be an annual management charge of 1.25 per cent. The timing of the launch means that the new issue will straddle the tax years ending on April 5 and the one that begins on April 6. This also means the annual £6,000 personal equity plan allowance can be doubled to £12,000 for each investor, or £24,000 per couple.

There will also be a regular savings scheme from £50 a month or a minimum lump sum of £1,000. As with its previous blockbuster investment trust launches, M&G is aiming at the Pep market in an attempt to add to the £2 billion plus that the group already manages in such funds.

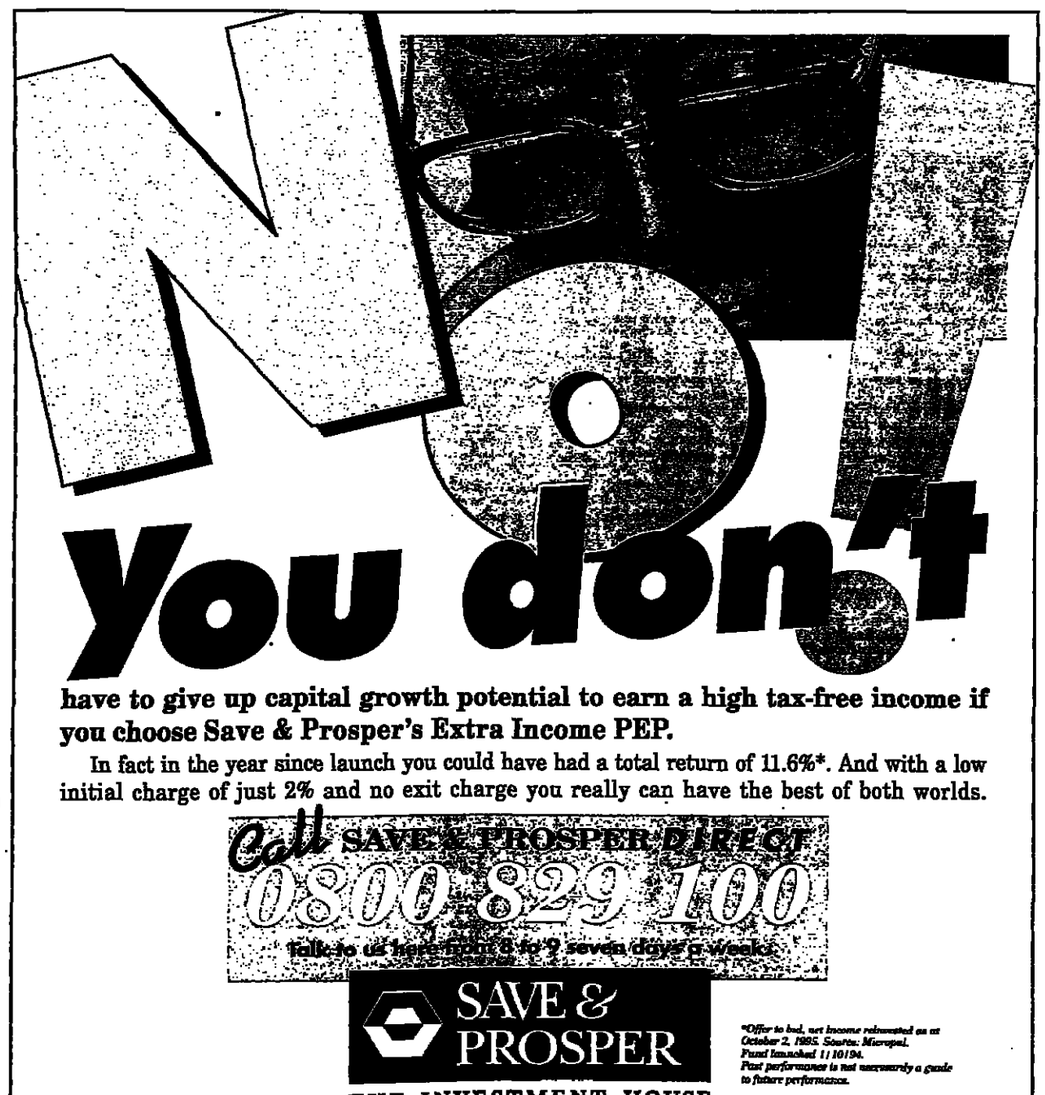

M&G said: "Research into previous new year buying patterns has showed that Pep investors are on the look out for something new to add to their Pep portfolios."

One man has kept track of his telephone, electricity, gas and water bills over 20 years. Morag Preston reports

Water bills leave a sinking feeling

WEEKEND MONEY — PRIVATISATION SPECIAL

People moan and groan about the cost of rising electricity and water bills, but few customers have the evidence to back their claims of soaring charges and a decline in service. However, there is a certain type of person who will collect every bill that drops through their door.

Deryk Venables, 74, who has lived in the same Victorian terraced house in Tunbridge Wells for more than 20 years, is of that rare species. He has kept a detailed record of every household account, stretching back to 1974, when he and his wife moved into their four-bedroom house in Kent. It was also the year that the structure of local government was radically reorganised.

Mr Venables says: "Once you start these things, it takes no time at all. I think it is interesting to see how costs went up and down, but then I am a bit of a stirrer."

In Mr Venables's filing cabinet, there is a neat record of all his telephone, electricity, and gas bills, as well as a collection of customer information leaflets, tracing the changes within each sector. Allowing for long, hot summers and harsh winters, his accounts reflect a shift in costs over the years, broadly in keeping with the rate of inflation.

Peter Boulding, financial analyst at the Centre for the Study of Regulated Industries, says: "The introduction of regulatory price control in the telephone, electricity, and gas industry, explains why costs have not really gone up. Relative to inflation, the prices have remained pretty stable, or have decreased." However, Mr Venables's sewerage and water bills are significantly higher than they were less than ten years ago, even though the supply of water to his house has remained the same.

The increase was a feature of the water industry privatisation in November 1989, says Dr Boulding. "One of the prime motives for privatisation was the Government's desire to shift responsibility for investment away from taxpayers and on to water charge payers."

Until 1989, the water service in Tunbridge Wells was under the joint control of Mid Sussex Water and the West Kent Water Company. The two companies were brought under one umbrella with Eastbourne as South East Water in 1993, by the French Saur Group. South East Water bills are the highest in the UK at £157.

Between 1989 and 1995, South East water charges rose 95 per cent, while bills from Tendring Hundred Water Services in Essex rose 154 per cent.

Until 1980, a sewerage charge was included in Mr Venables's rates bill, and was collected by Tunbridge Wells District Council as the agent of Southern Water Authority. Between 1980 and 1989, Mr Venables would have been billed directly by Southern Water Authority, which changed to Southern Water Services after privatisation. Because the company is particularly exposed to the high costs of legislation on coastal cleaning, Southern Water charges are among the top five in Britain. They increased by 71 per cent between 1989 and 1995.

David Stainthorpe, director of customer affairs for Southern Water Services, says: "Any increase over and above inflation relates to environmental improvements, certainly in the post-privatisation period. There has been the bathing water directives and the Control of Pollution Acts in the past, and there will be the Urban Waste Water Treatment directive in the future."

Dr Boulding adds: "Both water and sewerage costs are likely to increase over the next ten years — water slightly less than sewerage. The price caps have been set by the regulator, but that hides a lot of other things, including local differences between companies. Southern sewerage bills will rise by at least 4 per cent in the first five years, then 3 per cent. But the worst of the urban waste water treatment directive is still to come.

"By introducing tariffs, the regulator is encouraging people to opt for metered water. Metering is currently beneficial for certain groups of customers, including single people living in high rateable accommodation.

"Some water companies have promoted metering, but have encountered difficulties where metered customers face substantially higher bills. A rebalancing of tariffs can make it more expensive for unmeasured customers."

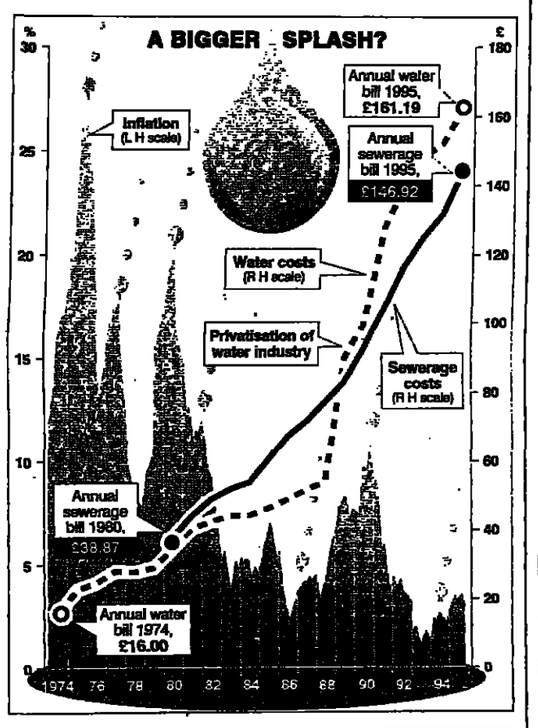

Mr Venables's data also plots both the arrival and disappearance of the community charge between 1990 and 1993. Based on a standard "per capita" charge, the amount altered dramatically during its short lifetime, and was reduced by £140 in 1991. Two years later, the community charge was replaced by council tax, which is based on capital value.

Mr Venables says: "Taxes were raised by the rich within small communities to look after the sick and needy. People need propping up. The increased charges, privatisation and advanced technology most certainly have not resulted in any apparent discernable benefits to me."

MATT RICHARDSON

Deryk Venables jotted down every detail of his household bills for two decades and found that water charges rose most

THE FORMULA

DIRECTORS of privatised water companies, "fat cats", and shareholders who have enjoyed vast profits, have been under attack from customers faced with soaring charges, which vary from region to region. Across the country, water bills went up 77 per cent between 1989 and 1994 — more than three times the rate of inflation — and profits increased by more than 70 per cent, according to a report by Which? magazine. The payout to shareholders increased 110 per cent. Ofwat, the industry regulator, has reset price limits every April since privatisation. Last year, the average increase was 1 per cent above the rate of inflation. Although most households receive bills related to the rateable value of their property plus a fixed charge, 7 per cent are metered and pay for the amount of water used. The annual increase companies can make is limited by the licences under which they operate. The limit is RPI plus K plus U: where RPI is the percentage increase in the retail price index in the year to November before the April change; K is a number set each year to reflect what the company needs to increase charges by, over and above inflation, in order to finance its services; and U is the amount of K not taken up in previous years.

Karen Zagor prepares for a frenzied opening to the big electricity flotation, while Caroline Merrell warns of the long-term pitfalls

ANGUS MEWSE

All revved up on starting Grid

After months of setbacks and delays, shares in the newly floated National Grid will start trading officially on Monday.

Professional investors have been buying and selling the shares for about a month in the "grey" market ahead of the flotation. In their last day of pre-float trading, National Grid shares yesterday rose ¼p to 209p on reasonable volume.

National Grid has barely been out of the news since last year, when it became clear the company was to be floated. In recent months, interest has reached fever pitch as the pending flotation triggered a bout of takeover bids for the regional electricity companies (Recs) that own the Grid.

There are 12 Recs scattered around England and Wales. The Recs, which technically own the National Grid until Monday, were themselves privatised in 1990.

The electricity industry is divided into three parts — generation, transmission and distribution. The Grid is essentially the middle man for England and Wales. It is responsible for transferring electricity from the plants that generate it to the companies which distribute it to customers. The Grid also manages an electricity pool which helps it to balance supply and demand.

The Grid makes its money by charging the Recs and the generators for use of its systems. Because the National Grid has no competition, it has its own regulator, Stephen Littlechild, who is responsible for making sure the Grid's pricing is fair. It was Professor Littlechild's investigation into pricing earlier this year that prevented the flotation from going ahead in the summer.

The seven Recs which are not involved in takeovers are distributing new Grid shares to their shareholders. The other five will have to sell their Grid shares within a year, but it is unclear whether they will all give their shares to investors. The Recs plan to give households in England and Wales £50 discounts, so even non-shareholders will benefit from the flotation.

The National Grid Group owns the National Grid plc. It is the NGG that is being floated on Monday.

■ Who gets what: For every 100 Rec shares, Northern Electricity shareholders will receive 107 Grid shares; Swalec shareholders 91.28 shares; London Electricity holders 85.28 shares; Midlands Electricity holders 80.9 shares; Yorkshire Electricity holders 75.66 shares; East Midlands Electricity holders 71.3 shares and Seeboard Electricity holders 48 shares.

■ Tax concerns: Grid shares issued to Rec shareholders will be treated as dividends for tax purposes. Basic rate taxpayers will have the newly reduced 20 per cent savings tax taken directly from their shares. Higher rate taxpayers will have to reimburse the Revenue an extra 20 per cent. If the Rec shares are already Pepped, there will be no tax to pay, but single company Pep holders will have to choose between receiving a cash equivalent in the Pep or taking the Grid shares and paying tax. There is no capital gains tax to pay until the shares are sold.

WEEKEND MONEY

PRIVATISATION SPECIAL

■ Sell, buy or hold? Investors with new Grid shares will now have to decide what to do with them. Most analysts see the Grid as a safe, if dull, investment. Unlike the Recs, where investors have seen share prices grow four or fivefold since privatisation, the Grid has less potential for such short-term stellar growth. This is partly because the Grid, through its Rec owners, has already been in the private domain for five years. As a result, it has already implemented many of the cost-cutting moves that allowed the Recs to perform so well for shareholders in the early years after privatisation.

In addition, the Recs had very little debt on their balance sheets when they were privatised. This allowed them to borrow against assets to pay shareholders.

Shiraz Allidina, utilities analyst at UBS, said: "We're not going to see explosive growth in Grid share prices, partly because the National Grid has already been privatised for five years and partly because there's a lot more debt already loaded onto the company, so there's less scope for gearing up. But I think it is a very good long-term investment."

■ Strengths: The Grid's core business is incredibly stable. Electricity transmission is unlikely to disappear in the next 100 years, and, even if demand declines, Recs will still need to use the Grid for transmission.

Long-term growth is likely to come from other activities such as its Energis telecommunications business. There is now about 3,500 km of fibre-optic cable strung along the Grid's network of pylons which could be used by telecommunications companies.

AT&T, the US telephone company, was thwarted from buying a stake in Energis last year, when the Recs could not reach consensus on a price. Independence should make it easier for the Grid to find a partner for Energis, but it is unclear what the value would be.

The Grid may also find a market overseas. It recently announced a £490 million joint venture with Balfour Beatty and NEI to upgrade Pakistan's electricity network.

■ Future threats: A sword of Damocles is hanging over the Grid in the form of another pricing review announcement next autumn. This will set the pricing structure from April 1997. If the regulator demands sharp price cuts, dividends may suffer. Until the review, it is unlikely that the Grid will embark on a substantial cost-cutting programme since it might have to pass on the savings to customers in the form of lower prices instead of shareholders in higher dividends. After the review, there may be room for manoeuvre. There is some concern that a Labour government would impose a "windfall tax" on the Grid, striking a blow to shareholders in the process.

Grid investors are unlikely to see their shares soar from an unexpected bid for the company. The Government has a "golden share", which essentially makes it a majority shareholder in the Grid.

■ How to sell or buy shares: Rec shareholders who are entitled to Grid shares will be able to sell them from Monday morning using any of the conventional methods. Discount dealers include Sharelink, Fidelity and NatWest's share-dealing services.

Share certificates will not be mailed out until December 18. Each certificate will have a form attached, allowing shareholders to use a small shareholder dealing facility. Shareholders with 500 or fewer Grid shares can sell their entire stake for free through the service. Shareholders who want to sell a fraction of their holding must use a conventional service.

The small shareholder dealing facility will also allow shareholders to buy up to £10,000 in Grid shares at a commission rate of 0.75 per cent, excluding stamp duty. There is a minimum fee of £7.50. The facility will be available until January 31, 1996.

Why it could pay to sample the waters

It has been a year of living dangerously for investors in the privatised companies. Those newer to the privatisation game, who bought shares in the electricity companies five years ago, would have had a 12-month bonanza.

However, private investors in more established privatisation companies such as British Telecom and British Gas will now begin to understand the meaning of the word "cyclical" in stockbrokers' parlance.

The share prices of both these companies have been falling since the beginning of the year.

The remaining private shareholders in British Petroleum, sold off in chunks by the Government, would also have had a disappointing week.

The Government decided to sell off the remaining shares for £540 million — an action that knocked 14p off the BP share price, which had been close to a high of 531p.

The bonanza for electricity company shareholders has been caused by the frenzied bid activity in the sector over the past year. Private investors lucky enough to have held shares in Norweb, Eastern, Manweb, and South Western, all of which have been taken over, will be looking at a return in the region of 300 per cent on their money.

For example, a £240 investment in the Eastern group at its privatisation in 1990, would have reaped a profit of about £750, when Hanson succeeded in taking over the company earlier this year.

Other Recs currently being bid for include Swalec, Seeboard, Midlands and Southern.

The bonanza for electricity company shareholders is in stark contrast to the poor year experienced by private investors with BT and British Gas.

Justin Urquhart Stewart, managing director of Barclays Stockbrokers, says: "Every successful company needs a sprinkling of magic dust; both these companies have lost it."

The effective break-up of the monopoly in gas has been accompanied by a series of public relations disasters.

Few people will forget the scenes of angry British Gas workers picketing the company's annual meeting in June with a pig named Cedric, an allusion to the 75 per cent pay rise awarded to Cedric Brown, British Gas chief executive. Mr Brown's wages were £475,000 last year, in spite of four years of falling profitability at the company. Analysts believe it will be at least 18 months before there is any recovery in profits. British Gas is now at 235p compared with the privatisation price of 135p.

British Telecom, on the other hand, although still a strongly profitable company, has been hit by increasing competition from mobile phones and Mercury.

Mr Urquhart Stewart says: "It is a strong, well-managed, internationally diversified company. Increased competition domestically has begun to eat a little around the edges."

If you were one of the winners of the privatisation lottery in 1995, where should you be looking to reinvest your profits?

If you are keen to keep your money in the utilities sector, analysts and stockbrokers unanimously endorse the water companies as a sector to consider. Northumbrian Water is currently the subject of a bid by French company Lyonnaise des Eaux.

Mathew Orr, partner with Killik & Co, the stockbroker, says: "With the likelihood of a windfall tax on utilities receding, the French and other European companies may be looking to purchase UK water companies. The water companies are certainly going to be more interesting next year, although there are not going to be as many bids as in the electricity companies."

Mr Orr points out that the water companies as a whole are not likely to be as attractive as the electricity companies. Many have to embark on expensive spending programmes to mend pipes and meet anti-pollution legislation. The companies favoured by brokers are Severn Trent and Anglian.

But stockbrokers do warn investors that the utilities are likely to remain a particularly volatile sector. Mr Orr says: "A Labour government is likely to favour a tougher regulatory regime in favour of the consumer, rather than being in favour of the shareholder."

How car is priced when it comes to the crunch

Morag Preston on a driver's long fight for a better payout by her insurer

TOM KIDD

Pauline Purvis secured a "compromise" write-off value for her wrecked Volvo

If you have been involved in a car accident, and are 100 per cent not to blame, you will want to reclaim on your motor insurance and replace your vehicle as soon as possible. However, as victims often discover, much to their disappointment, car valuation is not an exact science.

"Most people get a nasty shock when they realise the book price of their car," says the Insurance Ombudsman, who handled 1,123 motor cases last year, of which 274 were valuation disputes. Only 33 per cent of those cases were then revised in favour of the policyholder, highlighting what an emotive issue this is.

Pauline Purvis, 39, a supply teacher in Edinburgh, was driving to work early one morning in late September when a car shot out from a side road and hit her five-year-old Volvo. "It was as if it had dropped out of the sky," said Mrs Purvis, who, after intervention by Weekend Money, has only just won her battle with Prospero, one of the UK's leading motor insurers, for what she thinks is the true value of her car.

Because Mrs Purvis has comprehensive cover, as opposed to third party, fire and theft, Prospero has agreed to pay her claim, but she wants more money. Prospero declared her car a write-off, and originally offered £3,300 to replace her Volvo 345 GL 1.7, which she felt was too low. After looking in local newspapers, Mrs Purvis claims a similar car with 67,000 miles is worth £3,995. "I could get an older car or a different car for the amount I have been offered, but should I not expect to find myself in a position similar to that which I was in before the crash?" she said. "Are they hoping to haggle on the telephone?"

In most cases, insurance companies are open to discussion, because claims are based on the market value of a vehicle, and not the original purchase price. Insurers first refer to a selection of price "guides", and then take into account the condition of the vehicle, its mileage and geographical location. According to Glass's Guide, a car similar to Mrs Purvis's with 60,000 miles on the clock is worth £3,365.

David Hiley, claims manager at Prospero, said: "It's always something we're prepared to debate. Things aren't set in stone — it's a matter of opinion. People say that we've just got to claim it back from the other insurance company, but we've got to show that our offer was reasonable. They forget that garage forecourt prices include reconditioning and repair costs."

Prospero agreed to increase Mrs Purvis's claim and offered her £3,600. Mr Hiley said: "At the end of the day, we decided to offer a further £300 in an effort to resolve the matter on a compromise basis."

Direct Line, the UK's largest motor insurer, says: "It's logical, and it's bound up in insurance law, so people can't gain from an accident. Otherwise, you would get professional crashers, who could replace a Mini with a Rolls-Royce."

If there is a difference of opinion as to what a car is worth, and the insurer cannot reach an agreement with the policyholder, the latter can bring in an independent assessor, often from the Automobile Association.

The final stage is to take a complaint to the Insurance Ombudsman, who will invariably charge the insurance company a case referral fee of £350. In any one case, the ombudsman has the power to compel the insurance company to pay the policy holder up to £100,000 compensation.

On the advice of her local Citizens Advice Bureau, Mrs Purvis hired a lawyer to win back the cost of a temporary car, because her motor insurance policy does not cover uninsured losses. This has enabled her to continue at work, and shop for her 11-month-old son.

"I was having to turn down work further away because I didn't have enough money to hire a car, and schools were beginning to phone me less," says Mrs Purvis. "It really has been dragging on."

A rising income beats a fixed one!

Choose the Schroder PEP for an income which keeps growing as the years go by.

If you're looking for an investment which will provide you with a tax free income for your future, you may think you're spoilt for choice.

But, in fact, although there are many investments which can offer you a high rate of income now, few have the potential to increase the amount you would receive as the years go by. So, over time, your income is likely to gradually become worth less and less.

Choose the Schroder PEP and you'll find that your income will start from a sensible level which has the potential to grow over time. So, as your cost of living rises, so will the amount of income you will receive.

To illustrate this, we have compared the income you would have received by investing £6,000 in the Schroder PEP 15 years ago (if PEPs had been available then), with that produced by a £6,000 investment with a generous fixed yield of 10% p.a.

£6,000 invested in Schroder Income Fund PEP on 01.06.79.
in Fund Year*	10% fixed rate income p.a.	Schroder PEP income
1979/80	£600	£400.88
1983/84	£600	£575.78
1985/86	£600	£766.80
1988/89	£600	£1,253.78
1993/94	£600	£1,740.83

We think the results speak for themselves.

The Schroder PEP offers you a choice of two income funds, each with an initial PEP charge of only 3%. The minimum investment is £3,000.

So if you want to receive a higher income in the years ahead, don't settle for a fixed rate – go for a growing income, with the Schroder PEP. For your free brochure call the number below or return the coupon. Alternatively, contact your usual financial adviser.

Street-wise: Borrowers are being urged to scrutinise mortgage statements to avoid making incorrect payments

Check on loan payments could be in your interest

Marianne Curphey on what to do if sums err on the wrong side

WEEKEND MONEY GUIDE

Homeowners are being urged to check their annual mortgage statements to avoid paying too much or too little in interest repayments.

Many of Britain's leading lenders have come under fire this week for miscalculating interest repayments and, in some cases, failing to set up an endowment policy to support interest-only mortgages.

Laurence Shurman, the Banking Ombudsman, suggested, in his annual report, that the sharp rise in complaints about mortgages had come about because many were too complicated for some staff and customers to understand. "Customers have got to make some effort, but banks often write contracts in arcane legalese."

One of the most worrying issues Mr Shurman had to deal with was homeowners who discovered years down the line that the monthly payments they believed they were making to reduce the mortgage capital had only been covering the interest, and were shocked to discover the full amount of the loan was still outstanding. Often the bank had miscalculated the necessary payments, or had failed to let the borrower know that his monthly payments needed to go up to keep pace with a rise in interest rates.

In addition, some borrowers had been paying off the interest, believing an endowment policy had been set up to run alongside, when in fact it had not been.

Q What can you do if the bank has made a mistake?

A In these circumstances, the borrower can claim he or she is entitled, at the bank's sole expense, to be put where they would have been but for the bank's mistake. In return, the bank is likely to say that this ignores what the borrower has received, during the time up to the discovery of the error, by paying less than the full amount required.

Q What can the ombudsman do in a dispute?

A Legally, you are likely to be asked to pay back the underpaid amount, minus any financial "loss" that the mistake caused you. The ombudsman will calculate the difference between the benefit of the extra money and the disadvantage of making up for low contributions on an actuarial basis.

The mortgage rate is calculated at a standard 10 per cent and the benefit as an average return on savings of 5 per cent.

Q What is being done to help borrowers?

A The ombudsman, in common with the Office of Fair Trading (OFT), supports a move towards a "best advice" obligation to help borrowers to make a free and informed choice between various mortgage products. Mr Shurman said: "This might be achieved by a "reason why" letter, explaining the types of mortgage on offer, the type recommended, what it entailed and why it had been recommended."

Q Should I be watching out for interest rates?

A Over the coming months, many banks and building societies will be working out new rates of interest for their 10.4 million mortgage customers for the next financial year. Almost 402,000 homeowners currently owe more than three months' arrears on their mortgage.

Increasing your monthly mortgage payments to decrease the term of your loan is not always a simple exercise, as one Weekend Money reader from Hampshire discovered. She had a repayment mortgage with the Nationwide Building Society and began paying between £10 and £20 extra every month for a couple of years. She was shocked to find that, far from reducing the number of years she would need to pay off the interest, her capital and interest payments had been readjusted to take account of the overpayment and maintain the original term.

"The increased monthly payment would only be effective if I specifically requested Nationwide to alter the redemption date," she said.

The Nationwide said this week that it normally did not alter the loan term unless customers wrote or visited a branch to make the change.

"If someone does want to pay off part of their mortgage early we suggest they build up enough money in a savings account earning good interest and then make a lump-sum payment of either £500 or three times their monthly payment," a spokeswoman said. "They then have the option to reduce the term and keep paying the same interest, or keeping the original term and making smaller interest payments. If a lump sum is paid in during the year, we will take it off the capital owed and reduce interest immediately if the customer requests. However, it is important they tell us what they are intending."

Q How is the interest on my mortgage calculated?

A The Yorkshire Bank calculates mortgage interest on a daily basis, as does the Midland. Other high street lenders, including the Halifax and Abbey National, NatWest, Barclays and the Yorkshire Building Society reassess the interest customers should pay at the start of the year. The Yorkshire Building Society says that it is looking at the possibility of calculating interest more frequently than on an annual basis.

If you are planning to pay off part of your mortgage with a lump sum and your account is reassessed annually, it may be worth waiting until the end of your lender's financial year before sending a cheque.

Caroline Merrell discovers how to find peace of mind over those most treasured possessions

Insure against 24-carat blunders

The theft this week of the Duchess of York's jewels, a wedding present from the Queen, believed to be worth about £250,000, highlights some of the problems associated with owning expensive items.

Although the jewellery was swiftly recovered, specialist insurance brokers pointed out that if the jewels had been lost as a result of carelessness, then any insurance policy, which could cost between £5,000 and £6,000 a year, would be invalid.

Rob Page, marketing director of Hiscox Group, a leading insurer of high-value households, said: "High street insurers tend to take the view that if the jewellery is not in a safe or not being worn by the insured, then it is not insured. Specialist insurers take the view that providing the jewellery is being looked after by the insured, then it is covered."

He said the Duchess of York's theft, from a suitcase stored in the hold of an aircraft, would not normally be covered.

Anyone who has a collection of art or who owns antiques and other precious valuables knows that insuring them against the increasing number of specialist thieves or against damage can be extremely expensive. Many of the high street insurers will weight insurance premiums heavily because they believe that these types of clients represent a high risk.

Latest estimates suggest that specialist art thieves could steal up to £1 billion worth of paintings alone next year — a fact that will not help insurance companies' views on the risk of insuring these people.

For example, Commercial Union said it was impossible to say exactly what sort of loading anyone with art and antiques would get if they went to it for an insurance policy.

The costs of insurance would depend on the type of object to be insured — some precious items are more susceptible to fire and flood damage than others. The insurer emphasised it would have to be convinced the potential policyholder had taken all the necessary precautions to protect articles before offering any insurance.

However, it is possible for those who have a priceless collection of valuables to reduce their insurance premiums considerably by going to a specialist insurance broker or taking stringent precautions against protecting their valuables.

For many, it will be worth installing the latest alarm system and it is becoming increasingly the case that insurance companies will demand a detailed photographic record of the items to be insured.

Minets, the insurance broker, has a specialist division to deal with clients who have collections of fine art and precious valuables. It pointed out that a specialist broker or insurer would be able to deal with any claim in the most prompt and efficient manner.

A spokesman for the division said: "We would expect the client to make adequate provisions to cover themselves. Obviously, the amount would vary according to where the client lived. Insuring someone at the top of a tower block is entirely different from insuring someone in a country house surrounded by grounds."

He said one way a specialist broker might be able to help is with the use of specialist loss adjusters. Another way of streamlining the claims procedure is to have a comprehensive photographic record of all the items to be insured. The Minets spokesman believes this sort of record may become mandatory for some insurers.

Artscope, a specialist broker based in Farnborough, Hampshire, claims it can reduce insurance premiums by up to 30 per cent for some people. The company, a subsidiary of the Rollins Hudig Hall Group, recently launched a new service which uses a computer-based photography technique to store digital images of the client's possessions on a computer disk. If the worst does happen and a policyholder is burgled, then the computerised images can be circulated rapidly among police forces and auction houses both in the UK and worldwide, which should improve the chances of retrieval.

Richard King, Artscope International director, said using this technique could help to cut premium rates further. He said: "Some companies will reduce premiums by up to another 5 per cent if the system is used."

Hiscox will offer policyholders a 5 per cent discount if a photographic record is kept. Insuring household contents of about £5 million could cost £10,000 a year in insurance.

Chris Slatter, Artscope managing director, said: "Art theft is likely to exceed £1 billion this year unless greater efforts are made by those who own valuable possessions to not only protect their properties, but also to have access to high-quality photographic records of their fine art to help to recover stolen items."

Leon Liebman, an Artscope policyholder and computer specialist, is considering using the system. He said: "The service could be used to track items, particularly collectable ones."

Mr Leibman has an interest in a specialist auction house in America, where he believes the technique will also be useful.

Another recent innovation which could help anyone with more than £50,000 to insure is the Home Inventory Service. For a fee of £325, HIS will provide a basic photographic inventory of up to 75 pictures. One copy of the inventory is held by the client, while the other is kept on computer disk for future reference.

Bonhams, the London auction house, also offers a fixed-fee valuation service, which costs £600.

The Duchess of York's stolen jewellery may not have been fully covered

THE TIMES WEEKEND MONEY LETTERS

Share options need the spark taken out of them

From Mr C. Monaghan

Sir, As a small investor in the regional electricity companies I, along with all other such investors, have received a great deal of information re the flotation of the National Grid Group and share distribution.

One thing that seems to leap out of all the details is the share options granted to directors, some of whom have very small holdings and some none at all.

Your excellent paper has, over the past few months, given essential information regarding share options that have been made available to those occupying the boardrooms. Bearing in mind that small shareholders, or indeed any shareholders, have little or no influence over the granting of these options, is it not long overdue that there be some regulation for the capping of this state of affairs: where the self-appointed and the self-annointed award themselves these share options on the present scale?

Yours faithfully,
C. MONAGHAN,
2 Kirk Street,
Prestonpans, East Lothian.

Treat interest like capital gains tax

From Mr G. K. Moore

Sir, In fairness to savers in building societies, tax on the first £6,000 of interest should be exempt, to bring it in line with the capital gains tax exemption.

At present, many savers are in reality paying tax on capital saved, allowing for inflation, which has eroded their capital value of deposits.

Yours truly,
GORDON K. MOORE,
51 St Clare's Close,
Farley Road,
Littleover Hill, Derby.

Ernie and the eligible bond numbers

From Mr C. W. Whipp

Sir, In assuring readers that no bond numbers can be left out of the draw, the head of operations, Premium Bond Office, explains (Weekend Money Letters, December 2) that the numbers randomly generated by Ernie that match eligible bond numbers are the winners. But how is the list of eligible bond numbers kept up-to-date? If this work is done manually — for example, by keyboard operators — how is it checked? Since 1957, there must have been hundreds of millions of additions and deletions. Can Mr Threlfall be confident that no undetected errors have occurred during this long period of time — eg, deletion of bonds that have not, in fact, been cashed in?

Yours faithfully,
WALTER WHIPP,
3 Victoria House,
Weston Road, Bath.

THE TIMES MONEY INFORMATION SERVICE

Helpline seeks to halt debt spiral

National Debtline, a telephone helpline for people with debt problems, sees the demand for its service increase by more than 20 per cent in the months immediately after Christmas. Many of the calls are from people facing demands for payments missed on bills, such as the mortgage, because of the extra expense of Christmas. To help its callers to avoid the spiral into debt, National Debtline has produced a fact sheet on budgeting and financial planning. National Debtline is open to the public on 0121 359 8501.

■ Visa has joined forces with The Ski Club of Great Britain to produce a pocket-sized Ski Pass giving advice on how best to look after yourself and your holiday money on the slopes. Call 0800 106030, or write to Visa Ski Pass, PO Box 1803, London, NW1 8NQ.

■ An increasing number of employers are offering employment contracts with stable basic salaries, but with bonuses added to make up the total earnings package. R K Harrison Financial Planning Ltd has recognised that not all employees wish to have bonuses paid to them as cash, preferring to waive the bonus and use the money to boost their pension. The company has produced A Guide to Bonus Waivers, explaining the process involved in converting bonuses into pension provision. Call 0500 101015.

■ The Institute of Financial Planning has published a list of qualified independent financial advisers. Each adviser has passed high-level examinations in financial planning, acts on a fee-basis, and has agreed to follow a detailed code of practice. For a copy, call the institute on 0117 930 4434.

■ Support from readers of The Times to BESt Investment's Christmas appeal in aid of Help the Aged, has helped to raise more than £6,000 to date. BESt Investment is offering copies of its Pep magazine (cover price £25) in exchange for a £7 donation, each purchase enabling one pensioner to attend a Christmas party. Send a £7 cheque, made payable to Help the Aged, to Christmas Appeal, BESt Investment, 20 Mason's Yard, Duke Street, London SW1Y 6BU.

Bridgend captain joins the exodus of talented half backs from Wales

New era of unity pays dividends for Howley

By David Hands, rugby correspondent

ONCE upon a time, the English and Welsh would snarl at each other across the River Severn, make the occasional foray and return, like as not, with a bloody nose. Winning in Wales was the sine qua non, even for the best of English rugby union clubs and the standing joke concerned mutual trust and understanding: the Welsh didn't trust the English, who didn't understand the Welsh.

Now there is so much common ground between the two countries it is hardly believable. The benefits of an Anglo-Welsh league are generally understood, the leading clubs are working hand-in-glove and players are up and down the M4 like regular commuters. Two Welsh internationals have signed provisional forms for Wasps, two more for Harlequins and yesterday, Robert Howley, the Wales A scrum half, signed for Saracens.

"The English clubs are ahead of clubs in Wales in many respects," Howley, the Bridgend captain, said. "Many English clubs have found big-money backers since the game went professional. They are drawing up contracts and English players are being shown them. But, in Wales, I haven't seen a contract from a club and I don't know any Welsh player who has."

Not that the English are only chasing Welshmen: Olivier Merle and Thierry Lacroix, two French internationals, have been contacted by, among others, Newcastle, though Lacroix is also weighing up options offered by Italy and Natal.

Howley is the second Welsh scrum half to be linked with Saracens — Neath's Chris Bridges was the first — and while Wales continue to produce good decision-makers at half back they will continue to be a target. Arwel Thomas, late of Neath, is in his first season with Bristol and if Lee Jarvis can play as well as he did for Pontypridd against Leinster in midweek, he may not be deputy to Neil Jenkins at Sardis Road for long.

Meanwhile, the representatives of the leading English and Welsh clubs, who met in Bristol on Thursday, are poised to itemise their proposals for restructuring the season. "We suspect that the English and Welsh unions are doing what they always do, which is to organise things for us without consultation," David Tyler, Bristol's commercial manager, said.

"We want to emphasise the way we think things should be done. It's surprising how much we in England are in agreement with the Welsh." In particular, both countries seek to put four clubs each into Europe (in all probability alongside four from France, three each from Ireland and Scotland, and two from Italy), and the English will stress the need for commercial and television revenue to be channelled through to all the first-division clubs.

If they can get their way, clubs such as Bristol will avoid such fallow periods of the year as this month, when they are comparatively inactive. Instead, attention focuses on the CIS divisional championship finale — probably the last — at Nottingham and the evening game at Gloucester between the South West and the Western Samoans.

Only seven of the Midlands side which beat the Samoans a week ago defend the divisional title against the North, the withdrawals now including Paul Grayson, who will rest before his first England cap next Saturday. Paul Challinor (Harlequins) replaces him at stand-off half against a North XV from which two injured Sale forwards, Neil Ashurst and Charlie Vyvyan, have withdrawn while John Fowler is unavailable.

The South West, substantially weakened by the demands of England A, who play the Samoans on Tuesday, field a mixed bag at Kingsholm, including a newcomer from Exeter in Andy Turner. The Samoans field 12 of the XV which drew with Scotland and will hope for a win after defeats by the Midlands and the North.

SOUTH WEST DIVISION: P Hull (Bristol, captain), N Beal (Northampton), A Turner (Exeter), S Enoch (Pontypridd), P Holford (Gloucester), R Dix (Harlequins), B Fenley (Gloucester); T Windo (Gloucester), K Dunn (Wasps), D Hinkins (Bristol), P Glanville (Gloucester), D Sims (Gloucester), C Yandell (Saracens), J Pearson (Bristol), E Rollitt (Bristol).

Pontypridd must shake off Irish frustration

By David Hands

PONTYPRIDD, frustrated by their one-point defeat by Leinster in midweek, which excludes them from further European competition this season, must pick themselves up in time for tomorrow's tilt at the Heineken League leaders, Cardiff, at Sardis Road.

They have good reason for frustration: the match-winning penalty kicked by Alan McGowan for the Irishmen might have been awarded to Pontypridd for a shirt-tugging obstruction on Crispin Cormack. On such oversights do significant results depend but the Welsh club's play was encouraging after a poor fortnight and they will hope to inflict a third successive league defeat on Cardiff, a sequence they have not suffered since 1992.

Yet Cardiff are able to field a XV of whom only Andrew Lewis, the loose-head prop, has not been capped. Mark Ring returns after injury which kept him out of the defeat by Bridgend in a match switched to Sunday to allow Pontypridd time for recovery after their visit to Dublin, and which also earns live television coverage.

Bridgend must find a way against Aberavon of overcoming an injury crisis which leaves them able to name only one front-row forward, Lee Manning. They are keen not to expose inexperienced players to first-division rugby and there has been wild talk about artificially creating a safety problem to be resolved by the referee, either by demanding passive scrums or playing a game with no scrums at all — as happened once in New Zealand.

Swansea were also engaged in European action in midweek. Nevertheless they have not made extravagant changes for the game with lowly Treorchy. Colin Charvis comes into the back row and Marcus Thomas the front row while Robert Jones swops places at scrum half with his brother, Rhodri.

Leeds wary of complacency for Carlisle tie

By Christopher Irvine

IN 1982, a young New Zealand centre announced his arrival on the British rugby league scene with two tries on Carlisle's first visit to Headingley. Dean Bell induced the odd collywobble in the Leeds side that day and could be excused a degree of nervousness as the wheel comes full circle tomorrow.

Bell spent the following season at Leeds, before he returned there as coach 12 years later. His three-month tenure at the Yorkshire club has been a time of learning, experimentation and disappointment. With hopes of winning the Stones Championship extinguished by three successive defeats, the Regal Trophy is the last chance to salvage something from the centenary season.

Although Carlisle at home appears the most forgiving of quarter-final draws, the ability of Leeds to climb mountains and stub toes on molehills supports Bell's complaint, on arrival, of inconsistency. Since beating Wigan a month ago, Leeds have been embarrassed by Sheffield and taken apart by Warrington and Halifax.

Complacency is a regular pitfall. About meeting second division opposition, Hugh McGahan, Bell's lieutenant, said: "It will be a good test of character to see if we can rise to the occasion and prove we can play against a side that doesn't play in cherry and white."

Attitude is partly the problem at a club trying to rebuild for the Superleague, which explains McGahan's worrying recent description of a "holiday atmosphere" at Leeds — especially worrying since it will be Christmas before Garry Schofield, chief architect of the Wigan upset, can play again.

The return of George Mann and Kevin Iro stiffens the backbone of a Leeds side on the verge of a shake-out if bad results persist. The Gibbons brothers, David at scrum half and Anthony at full back, are part of the youthful vanguard being given their heads for the tie against 1,000-1 outsiders. Carlisle's 12-match winning run, including an extraordinary second-round defeat of Castleford, ended last week at Bramley. The Cumbrian side's main injury worries are to Tane Manihera and Gary Charlton, on whom they particularly rely, but 30 points still seems an overly generous start on the bookmakers' handicap coupon, given Leeds's present fortunes.

Like all sides drawing Wigan, Doug Laughton's heart sank. "I was confident we could beat anybody at home with the exception of one club," said the Widnes coach, who is not entirely without hope in the televised tie today, but added: "If we play like we did in our defeat by Featherstone last Sunday, we won't have a prayer."

Bell: making changes

Martin Offiah, Laughton's discovery, and now in the top ten all-time try-scorers list with 401 as a result of four last weekend, is a familiar danger back at his old club. Rob Smyth, on his second senior outing, is a lesser-known quantity on the other wing for Wigan, as Jason Robinson switches to full back for the injured Kris Radlinski.

Bridging a division gap is also the task of Rochdale at Warrington, while at St Helens, Scott Gibbs resumes at centre after a month's absence. Paul Newlove, their £500,000 world-record signing, is cup-tied, though, for the visit of Halifax.

Faith healing is charitable

Funnel and Another v Stewart and Others

Before Miss Hazel Williamson, QC

[Judgment November 29]

A gift to further faith healing was a valid charitable gift.

Miss Hazel Williamson, QC, so held, sitting as a depty High Court judge, in a reserved judgment in the Chancery Division on an originating summons issued by Gerald Peter Funnel and Brendan John Salsbury, the executors of the estate of Gwendolen Maud Le Cren Clarke, against Lillian Stewart, Pamela Austen, Michael Chatterton Clarke, Kingsley Chatterton Clarke, Commercial Union Trustees Ltd and the Attorney-General.

Mr Timothy Bowles for the executors; Mr William Henderson for the Attorney-General; Mr Kingsley Chatterton Clarke in person on behalf of himself and his brother, Mr Michael Chatterton Clarke, who would together be entitled on a partial intestacy; Commercial Union Trustees Ltd did not appear and was not represented.

HER LADYSHIP said that prior to her death the testatrix had been involved with the conduct of a small religious and healing movement, the centre of whose activities was her home at 139 Hoadswood Road, Hastings. The movement had been operating for at least 30 years.

The healing process involved the laying on of hands by those with a healing gift and the saying of prayers. The activities of the group fell into two categories: healing sessions and religious services.

By clause 6 of her will the testatrix left her residuary estate, including 139 Hoadswood Road, to Mrs Lillian Stewart and Mrs Pamela Austen "and I direct that they shall use the same ... to further the spiritual work now carried on by us together ... for so long as the law permits". The residuary estate was worth some £150,000.

Her Ladyship held that on a proper construction of the will the residuary estate was left to Mrs Stewart and Mrs Austen on trust rather than beneficially.

The question that then arose was whether the trust was a good charitable trust on whether it was invalid as being a non-charitable purpose trust.

Was "spiritual work" charitable either as a trust for the advancement of religion or as some other trust beneficial to the community under the fourth head in Commissioners of Income Tax v Pemsel ([1891] AC 531, 583)? Further, was the trust of an exclusively charitable nature?

The activities of the group divided into faith healing, or spiritual healing, sessions which were, in effect, public and religious services of which a quarter were public, but the remainder of which were open only to the small private inner group of working members.

The private religious meetings were not charitable, being confined to religious services for a closed group: see Gilmour v Coates ([1949] AC 426) concerning a gift to a contemplative order of nuns. It followed, Mr Bowles argued, that the object of the gift were not exclusively charitable and the gift therefore failed regardless of whether the remainder of the group's activities were charitable.

Assuming that the "spiritual work" was the faith healing which was being carried on, for that to be regarded as charitable in law, it had to be shown to be for the public benefit.

Mr Bowles relied on In re Hummeltenberg ([1923] 1 Ch 237) in which a gift to a college to train suitable persons as mediums was held not to be for the public benefit and therefore not charitable, and in particular a dictum of Mr Justice Russell (at p242) for the proposition that that requirement could be fulfilled only if there were evidence that the healing actually worked. The testatrix's belief that it worked was irrelevant.

He argued that on the evidence there was no sufficient evidence that the faith healing did actually work although he pointed out, in fairness, that on the authority of In re Price ([1943] Ch 422, 432) the test was quite a low one, that is that the work "may have that result".

Mr Henderson argued that faith healing had now become recognised as a charitable purpose without any religious element included. He referred to the Report of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales 1975 (HC 463 p22 paragraph 70) which indicated that.

He said that where, as here, there was also a religious element, then, provided the healing was open to the public, it was now established that it was charitable. He referred to In re Kerin (deceased) (The Times May 24, 1966).

He also relied on In re Watson ([1973] 1 WLR 1472, 1482) as demonstrating that where the trust was of a religious nature a different test of public benefit applied and this was assumed unless the contrary was shown.

Her Ladyship accepted Mr Henderson's arguments and held that the "spiritual work" in the form of faith healing was charitable.

She so held either on the basis that faith healing had by now, although that might not have been the case in 1923 at the time of In re Hummeltenberg, become a recognised public benefit, or that in any event the religious element in the present case rendered that work a charitable purpose within which a sufficient element of public benefit for the charity to be recognised by the law was assumed, there being no contrary evidence.

She also found that the spiritual healing work it did for members of the community was the raison d'etre of the group.

Therefore although the testatrix herself would have regarded the private religious services as an integral part of the general work, the private element was clearly ancillary or subsidiary to the public faith healing part of the group's work and did not disqualify it from being charitable: see Attorney-General v Ross ([1986] 1 WLR 252).

Accordingly, it was unnecessary to consider the question whether the evidence of actual public benefit, in the form of demonstrable efficaciousness of the group's work, was required. The gift in clause 6 of the will was a valid charitable gift.

Guidance was not unlawful

Regina v Secretary of State for the Environment, Ex parte Lancashire County Council

Before Mr Justice Judge

[Judgment November 24]

The policy and procedure guidance to the Local Government Commission for England issued by the Secretary of State for the Environment in June 1995 did not improperly interfere by adding to or detracting from the considerations imposed on the commission by section 13(5) of the Local Government Act 1992 when deciding whether there should be structural electoral or boundary changes in local government districts.

Nor did it, in the guise of purported guidance, provide unacceptable direction to the outcome of the commission's review.

Mr Justice Judge so stated in the Queen's Bench Division when dismissing an application by Lancashire County Council for judicial review of Policy and Procedure Guidance to the Local Government Commission for England issued by the Department of the Environment in June 1995 and of Local Government Commission for England (District Areas) Direction 1995 directing, inter alia, the Local Government Commission for England to conduct a review of the areas of Blackpool and Blackburn and to have regard to the Policy and Procedure Guidance.

Mr Duncan Ouseley, QC and Mr Paul Stinchcombe for the council; Mr Stephen Richards and Mr Neil Garnham for the secretary of state.

MR JUSTICE JUDGE said that on June 29, 1995 in the exercise of his powers under section 13(1) of the Local Government Act 1992 the secretary of state issued a directive directing the commission to conduct a review of 21 specific district council areas and make recommendations for structural, electoral or boundary changes if desirable.

The directive also provided for regard to be had to the Policy and Procedure Guidance issued in June 1995. Lancashire County Council challenged the lawfulness of both policy and directive.

The Local Government Commission for England's function was governed by section 13 of the 1992 Act.

It was an independent body with the task to make recommendations to the secretary of state, and those recommendations concerning structural, boundary or electoral changes had to appear desirable to the commission and not to the secretary of state.

The power of the secretary of state at that stage was limited. It would be unlawful by the terms of section 13(6) to undermine or extend the criteria by which the commission was bound.

The legislation had recently been considered in a case concerning Lancashire County Council and the previous 1993 policy and procedure guidance: see R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Ex parte Lancashire County Council (The Times February 3, 1994; [1994] All ER 165).

Both counsel reserved their positions over that judgment, but accepted that Mr Justice Jowitt's approach should be adopted. Mr Justice Jowitt had decided that there was a single unlawful sentence in the policy.

The significance of it was that on a fair reading it would have conveyed to the commission the message that the government's hoped-for result was to be seen as an end in itself and its effect was to undermine the statutory criteria.

The issue before the court was whether the June 1995 guidance fell within Mr Justice Jowitt's principle or whether it was a legitimate part of the secretary of state's exercise of his powers.

His Lordship drew attention to Mr Justice Jowitt's words that the secretary of state was not prohibited from explaining the policy provided he considered it was relevant to a consideration of the statutory criteria. Following Mr Justice Jowitt's ruling, the sentence was not part of the guidance.

The commission made recommendations in October 1994 concerning Blackpool and Blackburn.

On its face the commission's decision not to recommend they become unitary authorities was contrary to the secretary of state's express preference for unitary authorities.

The consequence of the commission's review was that a number of counties were hybrid with one or more unitary districts or one or more two-tier.

On March 2, 1995 the secretary of state explained his stance to the House of Commons and on June 22 decided to direct a further review. On June 29 a fresh policy and procedure guidance was issued.

Mr Ouseley challenged the guidance on the basis that it suffered in principle from the defect that led Mr Justice Jowitt to strike down the sentence in the previous guidance, namely it went beyond proper guidance and treated the secretary of state's preferred outcome as an end in itself. Alternatively, it amounted to a direction and was therefore unacceptable.

Mr Ouseley could not point to a single sentence, but that was not fatal, because if the guidance as a whole was flawed then it would fail. He looked at the context of the reasoning leading to the issue of the guidance. He also relied on the short timetable available.

His Lordship noted that care had to be taken to proceed from the inference that the secretary of state was unhappy with an earlier review and then jump to the conclusion that the guidance was unlawful.

In his Lordship's judgment, no fair reading of the guidance could lead to the conclusion that the secretary of state was seeking to enforce a unitary system on the districts bringing the present judicial review application.

His Lordship was satisfied the guidance did not improperly interfere by adding to or detracting from the considerations in section 13(5) nor did it in the guise of purported guidance provide unacceptable direction over the outcome of the review.

Coroner's power to summon jury when death occurs abroad

In re Neal (Coroner: Jury)

Before Lord Justice Staughton and Mr Justice Rougier

[Judgment November 17]

A coroner's power to summon a jury under section 8(3)(d) of the Coroners Act 1988 should be exercised where the circumstances warranted it even though the death occurred abroad.

The Queen's Bench Divisional Court so held when dismissing an application by Gordon Neal under section 13 of the 1988 Act to quash the inquisition into the death of his daughter, Kathleen Mary Neal, taken before the Surrey Coroner without a jury on June 25 and November 5, 1993 recording an open verdict.

The applicant's daughter had died in a holiday apartment in Spain, from carbon monoxide poisoning the source of which was an incorrectly installed and badly maintained water heater. Her body was brought home and the inquest began.

The coroner decided that there were several unanswered questions about the circumstances of the death, including how the water heater came to produce fatal levels of carbon monoxide, and he recorded an open verdict. Her father sought a fresh inquest, submitting that the appropriate verdict was one of misadventure.

Section 8 of the 1988 Act provides:

"(3) If it appears to a coroner ... that there is reason to suspect ... (d) that the death occurred in circumstances the continuance or possible recurrence of which is prejudicial to the health or safety of the public or any section of the public, he shall proceed to summon a jury..."

Mr James Munby, QC and Mr David B. Williams for Mr Neal; Mr Ian Burnett for the coroner.

LORD JUSTICE STAUGHTON said the applicant had submitted, inter alia, that the coroner should have summoned a jury.

That was disputed by counsel for the coroner on the basis, that while the presence of the body within the jurisdiction conferred jurisdiction on the coroner to hold an inquest, section 8(3)(d) had no application to circumstances outside the jurisdiction nor did it apply to the public or any section of the public outside the jurisdiction.

Accordingly, a jury was not mandatory when a death occurred outside the jurisdiction unless there were relevant circumstances to be taken into account within the jurisdiction.

His Lordship said that while that might be possible in cases under section 8(3)(a) to (c), under section 8(3)(d) it was just as important that those who travelled to Spain should be protected from the dangers of gas heaters as those who stayed at home.

Accordingly, his Lordship rejected the argument that section 8(3)(d) applied only where death occurred at home.

The circumstances of the death cried out for an inquiry by someone as to how such a dangerous situation existed but that was not the task imposed on the coroner. It might well have been said that the coroner should have summoned a jury given that the circumstances pointed to a danger of repetition.

At the end of the day, however, under the terms of section 13 of the 1988 Act, their Lordships had to decide whether it was necessary or desirable in the interest of justice to call for another inquest. In the circumstances of the present case however that test had not been fulfilled.

The case was an old one and it was open to question how much new material could be found. His Lordship could not see how the open verdict could be impugned on the basis that no reasonable coroner could have arrived at such a decision.

Mr Justice Rougier agreed.

Unfairness in ordering destruction of dog

Regina v Ealing Justices, Ex parte Fanneran

Before Lord Justice Staughton and Mr Justice Rougier

[Judgment November 22]

To order the destruction of a dog upon conviction of the dog handler without informing the owner of that dog was a breach of natural justice.

The Queen's Bench Divisional Court so held when allowing an application by Dianne Fanneran for judicial review of the decision of Ealing Justices on July 15, 1992 to accept a plea of guilty by her nephew to being in charge of her pit bull terrier in a public place without it being muzzled, contrary to section 1(2)(d) of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991, and ordering the destruction of the dog.

Ms Sandy Canavan for the applicant; Mr Stephen John for the respondent.

LORD JUSTICE STAUGHTON said that the applicant's nephew had taken the dog out but that there was a conflict of evidence as to what had then happened.

The nephew had said that although the dog had initially been muzzled and on a lead it developed kennel cough and was in distress so he removed its muzzle. The arresting officer, however, said that the dog was unmuzzled, not in any distress and the nephew was not carrying a muzzle.

Those were matters which his Lordship said did not need to be resolved but which showed that the case was not such an extreme one as might have appeared.

The nephew had been summonsed to appear before the justices but the applicant had not been informed about the hearing. The justices fined the nephew and ordered that the dog be destroyed.

Subsequently the applicant began proceedings in the county court and obtained an ex parte injunction restraining the police from destroying the dog.

The applicant submitted that as she was not notified of the hearing the justices' order should be quashed. The respondent, however, submitted that whether or not the applicant's presence at the hearing would have made any difference should be considered.

His Lordship said the notion that when the rules of natural justice had not been observed one could still uphold the result because there would not have been any difference, had to be treated with great caution because down that slippery slope lay the way to dictatorship.

However, where it was demonstrable that it would have made no difference the court could uphold a conviction, even where there had been a breach of natural justice.

There were any number of theoretical possibilities but his Lordship could not in the present case think of any which would have been of any use to the applicant or to her dog.

In his Lordship's judgment, in all probability the presence of the applicant would not have made any difference but the fact remained that she should have been told of the hearing and their Lordships had to think long and hard before upholding a case where there had been a breach of natural justice.

His Lordship did not accept that the conviction should be quashed but would not demur from Mr Justice Rougier's view that the destruction order ought to be quashed and the case sent back to the justices.

MR JUSTICE ROUGIER, agreeing, said that while acknowledging the protection of the public, the 1991 Act bore all the hallmarks of an ill-thought out piece of legislation.

It was still the duty of justices to act in accordance with natural justice and that had not happened in the present case.

Nebiolo does his best to prompt a bid from London

FROM DAVID MILLER IN MONTE CARLO

THE International Amateur Athletic Federation (IAAF) is waiting, indeed almost pleading, to be able to award the world championships of 2001 or 2003 to London. The domestic football authorities, who dominate the Sports Council panel that has deferred a decision on the location of a new national stadium, should be conscious of the chance that will be squandered by choosing Manchester.

"If Great Britain is building a new stadium at Wembley, what better could we imagine," Primo Nebiolo, president of the IAAF, said here yesterday. "After a probable championships outside Europe in 1999 [to be determined next May], the IAAF council would be sensible to elect Paris and London for the next two championships, though I do not have the votes in my pocket."

Despite the irony of the IAAF headquarters having been removed from Knightsbridge to Monte Carlo, Europe, and particularly Britain, remains the focal point of athletics outside the Olympic Games. Yet there are few substantial stadiums accommodating athletics. The grand prix cities of Zurich and Oslo, for example, have no such stadium. A reconstructed Wembley would be a candidate for other events, such as the European championships.

Nebiolo reaffirmed the foreign perception of Britain: that Manchester lacks the appeal of London, whatever its virtues. "That's reality," he said. "I was born in Turin. I believe Turin is a better city than Rome, but I must accept that Rome is the obvious candidate for the Olympic Games of 2004."

The wily Nebiolo, whose time as president has seen huge expansion of the sport as well as personal controversy, is busy digging the federation out of financial difficulties with his gambler's approach: asking sponsors for twice as much as they can afford, and getting half that, which is still more than anyone expected.

Nebiolo is confident that a replacement will shortly be announced for Mobil, the sponsor which put $2 million [£1.3 million] per annum into the grand prix, which, with prize-money, costs $5 million. "We have some names, and we have asked for two or three times more," he said. "If you want four, you ask for ten, and maybe get five. People say I'm crazy, but I'm becoming a good poker player."

The 1996 grand prix will include Melbourne, in February, and Tokyo, in May. For 1997, Nebiolo hopes that it will be a global circuit, like Formula One motor racing: Tokyo, Sydney, Johannesburg, São Paulo, Atlanta, Eugene, New York and then Europe.

Additionally, by the policy of divide-and-multiply, the IAAF now has three separate competitor bib-number sponsors for the world championships of 1997: two for Athens (outdoors, men and women) and one for the indoor championships, thereby doubling the total revenue. Names and numbers to be announced.

Today, Nebiolo will announce an Olympic promotional grand prix event for Atlanta on May 18 next year in the new Olympic stadium, supported by the International Olympic Committee and attended primarily by students and children. Track and field interest in the United States has declined, and Nebiolo said: "We need the US. They've given us fantastic athletes. We are ready to do something to help them."

A successful championships at Wembley might be a springboard for an Olympic bid for 2008 or 2012. Unofficially, the British Olympic Association has probably decided that 2004 is too soon to bid, and that 2012 is the long-term objective. Rome, which will be "upgraded" by the city council for the expected 36 million tourists who will arrive for the millennium, is likely to be the brand leader for 2004, with $2 billion guaranteed for the budget by the government.

The Cambridge University trial eights prepare for their race from Putney to Mortlake yesterday, with two of the youngest crews for many years taking to the water (Mike Rosewell writes). With illness afflicting two of their key performers — Ethan Ayer, an American and a winner at Henley, and Nick Burfitt, the British Olympic competitor — the personnel were all British and all undergraduates, a rare occurrence in this era. Although light on experience, there was no lack of ability on show with seven Great Britain under-23 performers involved. The two crews, Looks and Personality, set off from Putney in good conditions. Personality, on Surrey, achieved an early lead, as both went off at 44 strokes, and held a half-length advantage after a mile. Some good steering from Harrods to Hammersmith Bridge by Kevin Whyman, a 1993 junior international, gave them clear water and the crews rowed line astern along Chiswick Eyot, at the end of which Personality, by then at a higher stroke-rate, seemed to falter slightly after warnings from the umpire. As Whyman moved back to his Surrey station just before Barnes Bridge, a way through appeared for Looks, but their coxswain, Alistair Potts, hesitated slightly on his ruddering, and Personality's higher rate kept them ahead and gave them a final 1½-length win in a fast 17min 1sec. Robin Williams, the Cambridge coach, has produced another well-drilled squad and admitted to delight at the outcome and time. "That is pretty swift in anyone's book, and we were without two key men," he said. John Carver, the Cambridge president, is unlikely to follow in the footsteps of his grandfathers and father, who rode in winning Cambridge crews. Warren tightens security for Hale bout

BY SRIKUMAR SEN
BOXING CORRESPONDENT

THE bout between Ross Hale, the British and Commonwealth light welterweight champion, and Paul Ryan should be a good scrap while it lasts at York Hall, Bethnal Green, tonight, but Frank Warren, the promoter, is taking steps to ensure that the violent activity is kept within the confines of the ring.

While Warren is concerned about the fears of crowd trouble, because both boxers have a big following, he has taken no chances and made arrangements for a police presence in the hall and a force of 40 security men.

Warren said that, despite the vociferous backing the crowd will give the two men, the rival groups had no record of violence. Around 300 are expected from Bristol, Hale's home town, and considerably more from Hackney to support Ryan, but as the east London hall has a capacity of 1,200, a crowd of 700 or so committed supporters is clearly a worry.

Only last week, the British Boxing Board of Control reiterated the need for promoters to consult police and security companies over events that draw strong rival groups. The supporters are going to be kept apart tonight. Hale's men will be on the balcony while Ryan's followers will be on the floor of the hall.

The bout, too, gives some cause for concern as Ryan, in winning the World Boxing Organisation inter-continental title against Oscar Palomino, of Spain, last July, received some blows to the head that appeared to show he might be at some risk in a bout at a higher level. The contest tonight looks just such a bout.

Ryan admits that, after meeting Palomino, he remained in a daze for 48 hours. "I was concussed," he said.

Hale is a harder puncher than Palomino and could do serious damage if Ryan is allowed to take too many blows. Ryan is unbeaten in 21 contests, and has won 19 inside the distance. He is rated No 2 after Hale in the WBO rankings. On paper, Ryan appears to have a good chance of winning. Indeed, the Londoner, being an unorthodox boxer, could prove awkward, but Hale is likely to end the bout in five or six rounds.

England give chance to captain Cooke

ALAN COOKE, the Commonwealth championships silver medal-winner, has been made player-captain of the England table tennis team for the European Nations Cup in Bayreuth next month (Richard Eaton writes). The appointment of Cooke, 30, for the first time, suggests that he may be considering retirement and becoming a candidate for the vacant post of national team manager.

His selection also indicates that the English Table Tennis Association is taking cautious steps to restructure after the twin blows of losing Denis Neale, the men's captain, who has emigrated, and Don Parker, who performed the dual role of national team manager and director of coaching before joining the British Olympic Association.

Cooke, a player of outstanding professionalism during a 12-year international career, might suit one of Parker's positions, and the invitation event in Germany could provide a useful opportunity to assess his potential.

Confusion over future leadership blurring outlook at Lancaster Gate

FA must act on question of succession

An exciting and exacting football week is in prospect: a World Cup draw in Paris on Tuesday, a European championship eliminator between Ireland and Holland at Anfield on Wednesday, the Euro '96 draw in Birmingham next Sunday. After that, the way ahead should become clear, except in England, where the leadership of our national game is a confused blur.

We need, as never before, someone to lead the old country through the new era. We need someone to go the distance, to drive the Football Association wagon into the next millennium, but someone who will also take care of the antiques in the back. Yet there is no sight or sound of the successor to Sir Bert Millichip who, at 82, will finish after the final whistle of the European championship next June.

Within the next few days, he and Graham Kelly, the FA chief executive, will apparently discuss with Terry Venables an extension to his contract to coach England through to the World Cup finals in France in 1998. Fair enough, continuity is a priority, and there is a fear that foreign clubs might lure Venables away. If he is seen as the right man to coach England, then he should be secured. But it is a strange thought that he would be signing without knowing who his boss, the next chairman of the FA, will be.

One would have thought that, if Sir Bert were a man of vision, the most precious legacy that he could hand on would be a guide to his own succession. There is none: Kelly admits that he cannot guess who the 90 councillors, the old amateurs clinging to their perks and their privileges, will choose.

To be fair, this choice is far from easy. Preserving the pro-am nature of football in this country goes beyond the glamour of the Premiership clubs, let alone the national side. The FA is duty-bound to take care of the grass roots, of thousands of clubs, millions who play the game for recreation. And, perhaps, what is coming, galloping towards us, is a separation between the professional clubs of the Premiership and the amateurs who also have every right to be represented.

Yet the matter of Venables is pressing. He says that he is bedevilled by a conspiracy, "death by a thousand lashes", over the allegations that were apparent before the FA hired him in January 1994, and which appear with the regularity of London buses: always another one behind. Assuming that he can make a date between matches and court appearances to sit down with Millichip and Kelly, what should they ask him?

First, they must decide whether the coach, who has had not one competitive test, is on the right lines, trying to teach English players such un-British techniques as ball possession rather than traditional up-and-at-'em fare.

Then they must ask what is plan B — the alternative to building England around Paul Gascoigne, whose temperamental flaw had him sent off again on Wednesday, and which is as distressing as his interminable injuries. But it is unreasonable to expect Millichip to make the decision on the man to coach England for up to two years after his retirement. Therefore, with even more haste, the FA should decide the chairmanship.

The candidates include the energetic David Dein, the Arsenal vice-chairman: but still unresolved is the question of why Arsenal accepted the George Graham bung repayments.

Far more likely is the choice between Geoff Thompson, a barrister from Sheffield, a stalwart of the disciplinary committee, for 16 years a trusted man on the FA Council, and Keith Wiseman, a solicitor of the shires, just as Sir Bert was before he took the chair. Wiseman is a director of Southampton. If none of these can win the vote, then perhaps Jimmy Hill, the transformed trade unionist, could be asked to front the FA leadership for an interim period.

All the above have a weakness: they are men of England, innocents abroad when it comes to the grand boulevards and the seedy alleys of the international game, although Thompson and Wiseman sit on committees of Uefa, the governing body of European football.

There is one dynamic man, a leader capable of vision and of international experience, who ought to be prevailed upon to take the chair. The name of Sir John Hall, the chairman of Newcastle United, sends tremors down the council chambers, not least for his virulent outspokenness about professional clubs being led by the amateurs of Lancaster Gate. But he has been asked, twice, to throw his hat in the ring. He has declined twice, yet the reward for perseverance might be that to take the tiger on board would be to tame him.

Sir John has no wish to be emasculated as a committee man, the councillors have no desire to risk their privileges to a radical new leader. So they wait for something, someone, to turn up. Abroad, they are laughing at us.

Coleman considers joining Palace exodus

By Peter Ball

THE exodus from Crystal Palace may soon continue. Coventry City yesterday agreed to pay the south London club £2.5 million for Chris Coleman, the Wales international defender.

Perhaps understandably, in view of Coventry's defensive record, Coleman was taking time to consider a move which would renew his partnership with Richard Shaw, and he will play for Palace against Oldham this afternoon. "I have agreed a fee with Ron Atkinson, and Chris gets the weekend to think about it," Ron Noades, the Palace chairman, said yesterday.

With their three Ireland players missing from the team today, Liverpool had hoped that Jamie Redknapp would return to play at Bolton Wanderers. Redknapp, however, has failed to recover in time and has withdrawn from the England squad for the international against Portugal on Tuesday.

Another likely international midfield absentee is more crucial. Roy Keane is losing his battle to be fit for Ireland's European championship play-off match with Holland at Anfield on Wednesday. After missing Manchester United's reserve game at Leeds United last night, Keane had hoped to play for the A team this morning, but even that proved beyond him.

"We had hoped to get him a game this weekend, but he hasn't yet done any full training," Alex Ferguson, the United manager, said yesterday. "He missed three days for his grandmother's funeral last week, and that set him back. I will let Jack Charlton know at our game today."

Robert Lee has won the player-of-the-month award for November for his consistent contribution to Newcastle United's ongoing success. "I've said he's the best midfield player in Britain at the moment, and that's a view that's reflected in this award," Kevin Keegan, his manager, said. "He has made an enormous contribution on the field, not just in the black and white of Newcastle, but in an England shirt, too."

Ambitious Celtic pin hopes on Danish influence

By Kevin McCarra

CELTIC yesterday signed the Danish international, Morten Wieghorst, from Dundee in a £600,000 package that sees the reserve full back Barry Smith move to Dens Park as part of the deal. acquisition of the midfield player, even for a comparatively modest fee, underlines Celtic's determination to strengthen their squad at a time when the club, four points behind Rangers, are making their most plausible bid for the Bell's Scottish League premier division title for years.

Wieghorst first came to notice when he played for the Danish club, Lyngby, in a European Cup tie against Rangers in 1992. His poise and economical use of the ball attracted interest but it was Dundee who moved with alacrity to purchase him for £225,000. The player's career in Scotland has been incongruous: while his club has subsequently been relegated, Wieghorst's prospects have improved greatly.

Before coming to this country, he was not seriously considered for international football. His experiences here, however, have added to his strength and competitiveness to such an extent that he has since won five caps for Denmark, the European champions, and now holds down a regular place in Richard Moller Nielsen's squad.

While Wieghorst is not likely to make his debut for Celtic against Hibernian today, his precise role in the club's plans remains a matter for conjecture. Celtic are strong in midfield and the manager, Tommy Burns, has said that he does not intend to create a vacancy there by selling John Collins, who will be offered a new contract shortly.

With Lyngby, Wieghorst did at times feature in defence and Burns indicated it is an option that is likely to be exercised again. "Primarily, he is a good footballer," the manager said, "But our line of thought at the moment does tend to see him as a centre half." If the deal is economical, though, Burns's total expenditure on the squad nonetheless totals over £7 million now.

THE TIMES MATCH-BY-MATCH GUIDE TO THE PREMIERSHIP THIS WEEKEND

BOLTON v LIVERPOOL

When Bolton extended Newcastle and beat Arsenal, their performances suggested that they could win enough points at Burnden Park for survival; since then, that conclusion has looked highly suspect. Liverpool's appalling run surely has to end some time, but with the Irish contingent, and Redknapp and Ruddock missing today, as Bjornebye and Clough come in, there could not be a better time to meet Liverpool. The admirable Scott Sellars makes his debut and that should help.

CHELSEA v NEWCASTLE

Despite scoring three, Newcastle had to be content with a draw at Wimbledon; according to the league table, this trip to London should be harder. But while Newcastle are certainly capable of scoring three at Stamford Bridge — unless Chelsea decide to defend in depth at home, too — are Chelsea capable of exploiting Newcastle's one Achilles heel? It doesn't look likely. There might be peace in the boardroom, but on the field Chelsea are still short of quality.

COVENTRY v BLACKBURN

On Wednesday, Blackburn at last broke their duck in Europe; can they make it a record week by claiming their first away win of the season? If they can't, they should give up away games, because Shearer could repeat his Ewood Park devastation of Coventry's defence — possibly the worst the Premiership has seen. Poor Dion Dublin and the other Coventry attackers, knowing that they have to score three or four to stand a chance — and that's not likely against Blackburn.

LEEDS v WIMBLEDON

What are we to make of Leeds? A fine performance against Blackburn, followed by a dire one against Manchester City, not just in losing, but in the style, with the ball crashed aimlessly forward — not the type of thing to suit Yeboah, who is no willing Lee Chapman, nor Brolin, who wants the ball to feet so he can play. Wimbledon will deal with the long balls happily enough, and there is nothing wrong with their spirit, so they could prove another surprising obstacle for the supposed title contenders.

MANCHESTER UNITED v SHEFFIELD WED

According to David Pleat, Sheffield Wednesday's defensive performance on Monday was unusual. Let's hope he's right, because if they play like that here, Andy Cole's tribulations could come to an abrupt end with a repeat of his five against Ipswich. Schmeichel, Pallister, Irwin, Butt and Keane are missing, but with Cantona on fire, Giggs back, and Beckham and Scholes in vibrant form, Wednesday will need to play a lot better than recently to gain anything.

MIDDLESBROUGH v MANCHESTER CITY

City always looked too good to be relegation candidates — but not good enough to have a better run than United, as they have recently. Kinkladze is better than Juninho was the message from Maine Road and, if they survive here without Fitzroit to support the Georgian, we will have to take them semi-seriously. Middlesbrough haven't flowed since the Brazilian arrived, but Fjortoft's form has been poor and a lack of goals is the main problem for both sides — suggesting an interesting but low-scoring game.

SOUTHAMPTON v ARSENAL

No Bergkamp has begun to mean problems for Arsenal, but they should be too strong for Southampton, unless the draw at Anfield has changed the season for the Saints. If Bergkamp is important for Arsenal, Southampton stand or fall on Le Tissier's contribution. After looking totally out of sorts, reports from Anfield suggest that he may be recovering his desire. If so, Southampton will stand a chance of avoiding the drop even if it doesn't tilt the balance this afternoon.

TOTTENHAM v QPR

Hard to believe those pre-season predictions and early-season struggles now. Spurs are looking a solid side as well as an attractive one; but they need to win the lesser derby games — like Chelsea last week and this one — as well as beating the top sides if they are going to be more than a good side chasing the leaders. They just need a win or two; they still look better than Blackburn, Liverpool candidates, but they need goals. In days past, Jurgen Klinsmann's presence used to be the answer to that prayer. Tottenham's reliance on Hotspur.

TOMORROW

NOTTINGHAM FOREST v ASTON VILLA

Sadly, no McGrath, Townsend and Staunton means Villa are a long way short of full strength for what should have been a fascinating Midlands derby. Even as it will have its interest. Forest are amazing, a tribute to the virtues of continuity. Any Brian Clough players from the past 20 years would have dropped happily into the team which survived in Lyons. At home, though, where the onus is on them, it can be another story and Villa could maintain their position despite their absentees.

MONDAY

EVERTON v WEST HAM

West Ham at Goodison on a cold Monday night does not sound appealing, but Everton are emerging from their mini-slump and, with Duncan Ferguson guaranteed a place on the bench after his successful outing for the reserves, a full house is on the cards. Ferguson and Amokachi are some of the Premiership's more exotic pairings, but they will test West Ham's recent revival, and the prospect of Kanchelskis against Dicks is almost worth the price of admission on its own.

Henderson-trained chaser travels to Cheltenham with a mission

Big Matt to gain poignant success

BY JULIAN MUSCAT

JULIAN HERBERT

Big Matt, third in the Mackeson Gold Cup last month, is a leading contender for the Tripleprint Gold Cup at Cheltenham today

A BERTH in the winner's enclosure is usually punctuated by a sea of smiling faces, but the atmosphere will be bitter-sweet should Big Matt emerge triumphant from the Tripleprint Gold Cup at Cheltenham today.

The seven-year-old certainly telegraphed his prospects with a brave third place in the Mackeson Gold Cup at this venue four weeks ago. But the triumvirate for whom the horse competed was cruelly splintered on the death, two weeks ago, of Richard Shaw, in whose name Big Matt was registered.

Bill Brown and Ted Benfield have since assumed ownership of Big Matt. Along with their trainer, Nicky Henderson, they will find it difficult to harness their emotions in the event of victory. "This one will definitely be in Richard's memory," Henderson said yesterday. "He was a great mate; an absolute star who had horses with me for years."

The best of them was Sparkling Flame, a talented chaser five years back but one who never quite carried off a race of today's importance. In the Mackeson, Big Matt had just entered the slipstream of the duelling Dublin Flyer and Egypt Mill Prince when he clattered into the final fence. He had been conservatively ridden by Mick Fitzgerald, who heeded his trainer's anxiety about Big Matt lasting home over the extended 2½ miles.

"It was a worry at the time," Henderson acknowledged. "He developed into a pretty good two-miler by the end of last season. But in the end he definitely saw it out. He would have gone very close to winning if he had not made that mistake at the last."

Henderson's words are an apposite reflection of events. Indeed, had Big Matt been tiring, he would have beaten a hasty retreat. Yet he staged a stirring rally to finish just over four lengths adrift of Dublin Flyer. He holds Gnome's Tycoon on that showing and Fitzgerald can now afford to employ more positive tactics.

The portents look encouraging but it will not be easy. Couldnt Be Better proved a revelation in the Hennessy Cognac Gold Cup. The eight-year-old looked a much-improved horse over 3¼ miles in the testing ground that day. He could make fools of them all but the odds are that he revels over long distances and in the mud. Conditions at Cheltenham could hardly be more contrasting.

For all his evident progress at less taxing venues, Unguided Missile is another stepping back in distance. And he came a cropper when hiked in class for the Sun Alliance Chase here in March. Of the others, Around The Horn is unproven at this trip. All For Luck has plenty on his plate. And on the approach to his fourteenth birthday, the pensioner's ticket bought for Beech Road is in grave danger of expiring.

That leaves Easy Buck, who improved on his first outing for Nigel Twiston-Davies when fencing with panache at Newbury. It may be significant that this prolific winner is at his best on flat tracks. Like Unguided Missile, Easy Buck toppled over when tried around the Cheltenham undulations in March. By contrast, Big Matt improved for the fourth time in as many starts when third in the Mackeson. A duplication of that effort would almost certainly suffice.

Only on Haydock's abandonment would Monsieur Le Cure line up against Big Matt. John Edwards's chaser will be otherwise engaged in the Tommy Whittle Chase and an encounter with One Man.

It would be pitiful if One Man was again thwarted by the weather, as he was on Hennessy day. One Man is favoured by the race conditions. Monsieur Le Cure is not; nor did he seem comfortable over Haydock's drop fences in January. Anything less than a grey blur would come as a great surprise.

Lingfield off

THE meeting scheduled for Lingfield Park today has been called off because of snow. It is the fourth meeting to be lost to the weather this National Hunt season.

Fergus Cameron, the assistant clerk of the course, said: "There is still snow on the course and although there was a slight thaw this morning the temperature has dropped again. Any snow that is left at the moment will still be there tomorrow."

The Grey Monk can continue winning habit

TODAY'S RACES ON TELEVISION

CHELTENHAM
CHANNEL 4

1.55: Atours has improved with each run this season, finishing 1½ lengths second to Large Action at Ascot last time. He has a useful turn of foot but is prone to the odd mistake which, at this level, can scupper winning opportunities. Mysilv, two places ahead of Atours in last season's Champion Hurdle, is weighted to confirm that form. She looks set for another good season after easily landing the odds at Cheltenham.

2.35: see left.

3.10: The Grey Monk will start at short odds after wide-margin successes at Ayr and Carlisle, which suggest he could take high rank among this season's novice chasers. The seven-year-old's jumping has looked particularly accomplished for a new recruit to fencing. Linden's Lotto has won five of his eight completed starts since being sent chasing, but those looking for an each-way alternative to the favourite should look to Falmouth Bay. Simon Sherwood rates his six-year-old highly and further improvement is on the cards after a successful chasing debut at Taunton.

3.45: Killone Abbot improved to win at Newbury a fortnight ago, but the muddy conditions were very much in his favour that day. While Jim Old's hurdler is entitled to come on for that run, he may find it difficult to cope with Putty Road, after finishing more than 14 lengths behind the Sun Alliance Hurdle winner last March. David Nicholson's runner did particularly well to finish so close to Chief's Song over an inadequate trip here two weeks ago, and that form was enhanced when the winner landed the William Hill Handicap Hurdle at Sandown last Saturday.

HAYDOCK PARK
BBC1

1.00: Snitton Lane will like the ground but is best off a strong gallop. With just three ranged against her, she is unlikely to get that here. This looks teed up for Easthorpe, who races from the same mark as when strolling home from one opponent over the course and distance last time.

1.30: The promise of Sparky Gayle entitles him to marginal preference over Home Counties, who has yet to win over this trip. Sparky Gayle did well to get up on his reappearance at Ayr and can improve again. Pridwell, a disappointment over fences, showed a glimmer of his old spirit when reverting to hurdles last time and is not out of it. His stablemate, Encore Un Peu, remains an enigma with his own ideas. He cannot safely be ruled out.

2.00: see left.

2.30: Aljadeer came good with a vengeance last term and has plenty going for him. Although hardly thrown in, the six-year-old is almost certainly improving and should be straighter for his recent reappearance. Trump and Great Easeby are closely matched but neither has the scope of the selection. River Island and Grace Card have had their troubles and a bigger danger may be Bang In Trouble. The four-year-old looked a promising stayer last season until a burst blood vessel halted his progress.

HUGH ROUTLEDGE

Zephyrus holds the lead at the last flight on his way to winning the Cheltenham Sponsorship Club Novices' Hurdle yesterday

Minton keeps Triumph in mind

The Racing Journalist of the Year, Richard Evans, sees a bloodstock agent repeat his winning formula

David Minton has done it again. The bloodstock agent has a magic touch when it comes to selecting Flat racing cast-offs for National Hunt racing and yesterday his latest "find" was promoted to favouritism for the Triumph Hurdle after galloping to an impressive victory at Cheltenham.

The three-length success of the Nicky Henderson-trained Our Kris in the Million In Mind Three-Years-Old Novices' Hurdle could hardly have been more appropriate. For the former Guy Harwood colt was bought for 20,000 guineas by Minton for the Million In Mind partnership — which recouped its £2,500 race sponsorship cash, with interest.

"Minty," as the Pickwick lookalike is affectionately known, was the toast of the 138 partnership members after Our Kris forged to the front two out before showing admirable determination up the Cheltenham hill to withstand the threat posed by Danjing and Kippanour.

The race attracted far and away the best line-up of three-year-old hurdlers this season and Coral was sufficiently impressed to make the Kris colt 16-1 favourite for the Triumph. Two years ago Mysilv, also bought by Minton for the Million In Mind partnership, won the same race before going on to win the Triumph and, as many of the partnership members celebrated in the winner's enclosure yesterday, the dream of a repeat performance was very much on everyone's minds.

"He's got a long way to go to match Mysilv but he's a lovely horse," Henderson enthused. "He'll probably have one more run before we freshen him up and prepare him for the Festival. Like owners of every three-year-old in the country, we are thinkng about March."

Our Kris completed a double for Henderson and his stable jockey, Mick Fitzgerald, who also readily captured the Southam Handicap Hurdle with Cheryl's Lad. The 2-1 favourite had little trouble disposing of Morstock by eight lengths.

Bad luck supposedly comes in doses of three and Oliver Sherwood has been on the receiving end this week with serious setbacks to Large Action and Berude Not To, and a bad fall for Callisoe Bay, his promising novice chaser. However, he managed to raise a smile after Zephyrus maintained his unbeaten record to land the well-contested Cheltenham Sponsorship Club Novices' Hurdle.

"Twenty four hours is a long time in National Hunt racing," the Lambourn trainer said somewhat ruefully as he cast his mind back to the reverses of recent days. "Zephyrus was much sharper than he was when winning at Warwick. He shows us nothing at home but I was delighted with the way he performed and jumped.

"I will definitely step him up in trip and, ideally, he wants softer ground. We will have a crack at the Challow Hurdle, which is a race I like."

Zephyrus had a couple of lengths to spare over Shankar with the same distance back to Kimanicky, who ran an excellent first race for Nicky Henderson, and looks likely to win a race soon.

Josh Gifford's ruddy complexion was an even deeper hue after Run Up The Flag, the 6-4 favourite for the Astec Handicap Chase, led over the final fence only to lose out up the stiff finish to Yorkshire Gale, the stable's second string, who went off at 10-1.

Turning for home it appeared a question of how far Run Up The Flag would win by as he toyed with the leader, Edimbourg, while Yorkshire Gale appeared beaten in third. However, the favourite found precious little after hitting the front, while Yorkshire Gale gained his second wind to outgun Edimbourg.

"I thought Yorkshire Gale would need the run. I think he blew up and then ran on again. Philip [Hide] thought he may have hit the front too soon on Run Up The Flag, but that is racing," Gifford explained.

Ertl's giant step dents Seizinger's advantage

BY OUR SPORTS STAFF

MARTINA ERTL won the first giant slalom of the women's Alpine skiing season in Val d'Isère yesterday but fell nine points short of securing the overall lead in the World Cup.

The 22-year-old German, who won the first super giant slalom event of the season in Vail, Colorado, last week, confirmed she was the most gifted all-round competitor of the early season as she resisted the challenges of Mojca Suhadolc, of Slovenia, and Alexandra Meissnitzer, of Austria, who came second and third respectively.

Ertl recorded a combined time of 1min 54.44sec, raising her World Cup points tally to 251 but her compatriot, Katja Seizinger, produced an excellent performance in the second round to take sixth place and retain the overall World Cup lead.

Having taken command in the first round, Ertl produced a a consistent run in the afternoon to secure her second victory of the season and the fifth of her career.

Meissnitzer, who had her first World Cup win in the super giant slalom on Thursday, was celebrating on the podium again, taking third place in 1min 54.83sec. She moved into third position in the World Cup standings.

Final practice for the men's downhill race at Val d'Isère was disrupted by an injury to A. J. Kitt, who was taken to hospital after being injured in a crash.

Doctors on the course said they feared the 27-year-old American, who had his only World Cup success at the French resort in 1991, may have torn knee ligaments. He fell after losing his balance on a bump halfway through his run.

☐ Willie Carson was the star in Sicily yesterday when the new Siracusa racecourse opened with the first officially recognised racing on the island since the 1950s. He made all to win the day's big race on Lord Carmelo by two lengths from John Reid on Landolfi.

Young Ern favoured by draw in Hong Kong

YOUNG ERN, trained by Simon Dow, tries to improve on last year's fourth in the Hong Kong International Bowl (7f), one of three valuable races run at Sha Tin tomorrow.

Young Ern, ridden by Richard Quinn, is well drawn in stall two. He is joined by fellow British-trained raiders in Cool Jazz (Michael Kinane) and Branston Abby (Michael Roberts). The Irish colt Desert Style (Kevin Manning) and the 1993 victor, Winning Partners, appear the main dangers to Young Ern.

Clive Brittain's Needle Gun (Frankie Dettori) has local hope Privilege and the French runner Partipral as his main opponents in the Hong Kong International Vase (1m 4f). Richard Hannon's Commoner, however, has met with a setback, and is still not a certain runner.

The Godolphin-owned Triarius is drawn on the wide outside in stall 13 for the Hong Kong International Cup (1m 1f), but Frankie Dettori should have sufficient time to take up a position before the first bend.

This looks to be the toughest event, as the classy French pair Shaanxi and Volochine also run. However, Mr Vitality, rated the best horse in Hong Kong, is expected to start favourite, but is untried beyond a mile.

THE EYE WITNESS OF CRICKET

Saturday portrait: Jonathan Edwards, by David Powell, athletics correspondent

Life beyond the sandpit more rewarding than mere leap into legend

ILLUSTRATION BY STEVE MARTIN

It was a damp and chilly second Sunday in June, raining intermittently, an afternoon when the demand for tea exceeded the supply. Loughborough University was hosting a four-way athletics fixture and, though the match rated barely a mention in the weekend sports fixtures, the press was there.

Loughborough students against Great Britain students, Great Britain juniors and an England squad, was the day's bread, but a 10,000 metres race to help to shape the Britain team for the 1995 world championships in Gothenburg was the honey. That was to be the story of the day, and the reporters counted down the 25 laps.

What did it matter that Jonathan Edwards was competing in the triple jump at the same time? He had made little impression the summer before and, since then, had been ill. He was not going to be worth watching in his first competition of the season, was he? No, the 10,000 metres would be more interesting.

Suddenly, panic. The public address announcer revealed that Edwards had just broken Keith Connor's 13-year-old British record. The rush was on for the Edwards story. He will remember this day less for his record than for it being the last when he could arrive at an athletics meeting and hardly be noticed.

In the nine weeks that followed, Edwards set another five British records, three world records, recorded the longest wind-assisted jump, won a European Cup gold medal, and became world champion. He went unbeaten all summer, in 14 competitions. He has the records, the medals, the memories, the money. Now, today and tomorrow, the awards may follow that will mark him not just as a wonderful athlete, but also as an extraordinary sportsman.

It is probable that today, in the opulent surroundings of the Monte Carlo Sporting Club, Edwards will be called to the stage as the International Amateur Athletic Federation's male world athlete of the year. Already he has been named as the European Athletic Association's male athlete of 1995. Tomorrow, he is up against Frank Bruno in the match to become BBC sports personality of the year: Bruno, the man Edwards said was "more popular than the Queen", versus "an ordinary, skinny guy", as Edwards described himself.

Triple jump champion of the world does not have the ring of achievement associated with heavyweight boxing champion of the world, but any man who can turn the triple jump into pub talk should not be underestimated. What is more, Edwards did it without lights, lasers, music, a roll-over opponent and the hype from Sky Sports.

Bruno may be lovable, but Edwards is striking for his humility. "People keep comparing my performances with those of Bob Beamon and Butch Reynolds, and that feels very odd because they are legends in the sport, and this is just me," he said. At Gothenburg, when he broke the world record twice in the first two rounds, he apologised to the competitor jumping next for the fuss that must have spoilt his concentration. Afterwards, Edwards thanked the officials. How many athletes remember to do that?

> 'He has records and medals, but even now he is not content to enjoy his fame and fortune'

During the grand prix at Crystal Palace, he withdrew after three rounds because he had jarred an ankle, but his decision weighed heavy on his conscience. "I knew people had come specifically to see me," he said. Yes, people had come especially to see him. No longer should he feel bad about his chosen profession, not now that he is in the forefront of the sports entertainment industry.

Twelve months before his crowning in Gothenburg, I was sitting with Edwards in a quiet corner of a Helsinki hotel in which his sponsor, Puma, was holding a press conference during the European championships. Linford Christie and Colin Jackson were the centre of attention. Edwards was more fly on the wall than Puma big cat. He was not a story.

He was telling me about his first year as a full-time athlete, feeling sorry for himself. He had been travelling the circuit, wishing he was at home in Heaton, Newcastle, to celebrate with his wife, Alison, the first birthday of their son, Samuel. "Sometimes I lie in bed at night and think: 'I jump into a sandpit for a living. Am I doing anything worthwhile here? The pointlessness of it.' You see doctors in Rwanda and think: 'They are making a difference, but I am jumping into a sandpit. Who benefits from that?' "

Articulate, engaging, intelligent, witty, Edwards sees life beyond the sandpit. Even now he is not content to enjoy his fame and fortune. Recently, he embarked on a correspondence degree course in theology. At Durham University, he gained a 2:1 in physics and, before becoming a full-time athlete, he was engaged in genetic research at Newcastle Royal Victoria Infirmary, working on chromosomes, analysing bone-marrow specimens from cancer patients.

The son of a Devon vicar, Edwards had an upbringing strict in its observance of the sabbath, though his decision, as a Christian, not to compete on Sundays was his own. He wanted to "show that God came first in my life". He refused even to study on Sundays for his university exams. He missed a world championships and two European Cups. In 1993, he changed his mind.

One baptist minister I know, whose daughter is a county athletics champion, said Edwards "has made a mistake — it is the Lord's day, not our day to do with as we please", but Edwards explained: "My conscience let me jump on a Sunday whereas before it had not. It came to the point where I thought: 'Basically, this is my job.' "

Edwards, now 29, went to West Buckland School, near Barnstaple, where he was more rugby player than athlete. "I knew the names of rugby players and cricketers but less of athletes," he said. However, in 1984, he won the English Schools title and left West Buckland with the Fortescue medal for outstanding academic and sporting success.

Edwards will enter Olympic year with absolutely no form from two Games. In his first Olympics, Seoul '88, he finished 23rd with 15.88 metres. Barcelona '92 was worse. At the very moment that Christie was winning 100 metres gold, Edwards was preparing to take his last qualifying jump, needing a good one to reach the final. He failed, finishing sixteenth out of 21 in his group, with 15.76 metres.

His world record is 18.29 metres, further than anybody else has jumped, even with a gusting wind behind. And it is worth remembering that triple jump is not a recently invented discipline. It was the first medal event on the programme of the first modern Olympics in 1896.

Edwards has settled in the North East, a Geordie without the accent. He is at a loss to explain his improvement because, he said, he is doing "nothing radically different". The experts put it down to speed, low take-off angle, good centre-of-mass position, and no forward rotation.

Edwards, though, has a vacant look when asked to explain. He wishes he could work out why he has improved so suddenly. "When I did that wind-assisted 18.43 at the European Cup, I could not quite equate it with triple jumping," he said. "It was like a shot put distance." Typical of the man that he should know that.

England A finally run into resistance

FROM PAT GIBSON IN PESHAWAR

FOR the first time on their cricket tour of Pakistan, England A have a fight on their hands after running into a little local difficulty on the road to the Khyber Pass.

It came in the form of reverse swing, which is as important a weapon to Pakistan's quick bowlers as the Kalashnikov is to the tribesmen who terrorise the border with Afghanistan not far from here, and it reduced England A to 102 for four on the first day of the final international.

The touring players knew they were in dangerous parts from the moment they walked into their hotel and read the welcoming sign: "Arms cannot be brought inside the hotel premises. Guards and gunmen are requested to deposit their weapons at the hotel security." How dangerous they were to discover once their captain, Hussain, had lost the toss and they had been sent in to bat on a damp pitch.

Knight and Gallian did well to get through a pre-lunch session reduced to an hour because of a late start. Then Gallian drove back a return catch to the off spinner, Akram Raza, two fast-medium bowlers. Shahid Nazir and Athar Laiq, went to work with a ball just 16 overs old.

Significantly, Hussain was the first victim. He has been an inspiration to the other batsmen throughout the tour. Now they saw him struggle for more than an hour over nine runs before Shahid had him leg-before and exposed McGrath, 20, to probably the most traumatic four balls of his short career.

The first, from Shahid, struck him on the knee and left him hobbling. The next two, from Athar, beat him as they swung away. The last went in the opposite direction to pin him leg-before and send McGrath away to contemplate scores of 0, 2, 0 and 0 since he made a century at Lahore nearly a month ago.

Six runs later, Knight, who had some hairy moments against the spinners but negotiated the swinging ball better than anyone in making 55, was given out leg-before to a ball from Shahid which might have missed leg stump, leaving Ostler and Pooley only too eager to accept when the umpires offered them the light 45 minutes before the close.

Hussain offered no excuses: "I was out there after lunch and they bowled extremely well. They got the ball reverse-swinging both ways, which makes it very difficult, especially for the new batsmen coming in, and they gave us the trickiest time we have experienced on this tour.

"We've had everything our own way until now but this is a bit more like Test cricket. In fact, it is exactly what will be happening when England play Pakistan next summer. The ball won't be straight up and down, it will be swinging both ways, and we're going to have to work it out."

The problem for the A team is that they do not have much time to do that if they are to prevent Pakistan A from squaring a series in which they have been outclassed so far. It is ironic, therefore, that the match would not have started when it did if England had not persuaded prevaricating officials that the pitch was perfectly playable. They must wish they had not bothered.

Warne moves close to Test landmark

SHANE WARNE moved within sight of 200 Test wickets as Sri Lanka struggled to 251 all out on the first day of the first Test against Australia in Perth yesterday.

The leg spinner, nursing several niggling injuries, claimed three Sri Lankan wickets to lift his Test haul to 198 in his 42nd appearance. Craig McDermott wrapped up the innings two balls before the scheduled close by bowling Kumar Dharmasena for 30 in the ninetieth over.

Sri Lanka, who won a Test series in Pakistan in September, elected to bat in ideal conditions after winning the toss. They batted positively and aggressively, but lost wickets at regular intervals.

Warne, who broke a toe less than three weeks ago and took the field with a minor elbow strain, received fine support from the fast bowlers, McDermott and Glenn McGrath. The new ball partners shared the other seven wickets, McGrath finishing with four for 81.

Romesh Kaluwitharana, the Sri Lanka wicketkeeper, was top scorer, reaching his half-century before falling to Warne in the final session. The leg spinner finished with figures of three for 75, having also accounted for Aravinda de Silva and Chaminda Vaas in his 27 overs.

McGrath had made the early inroads by taking the wickets of Asanka Gurusinha, for 46, the captain, Arjuna Ranatunga, for 32, and Chandika Hathurusinghe for 14. McDermott removed the other opener, Roshan Mahanama, for 15, and took three for 44 in the innings.

Australia had made three changes from the side that lost the third and final Test against Pakistan on Monday, drafting in Stuart Law and Ricky Ponting, both batsmen, for their Test debuts, and Brendon Julian, a pace bowler.

Lee joins Somerset next year

SHANE LEE, an Australian all-rounder, has signed a one-year contract to play for Somerset next season. The 22-year-old turned down an offer to play Lancashire League cricket and so replaces Mushtaq Ahmed, the Pakistan leg spinner, whom Somerset hope will return as their overseas player when free of Test duty in 1997.

A graduate of the Australian Cricket Academy, Lee has scored three centuries in 21 first-class games for New South Wales and has best bowling figures of four for 20.

A hard-hitting middle-order batsman and quick bowler, he is tipped to be a member of the Australia squad for the World Cup next year.

A maiden century by Lee's New South Wales colleague, Richard Chee Quee, helped the state side to 266 for five and a first innings lead over West Indies on the second day of the four-day match in Newcastle yesterday. Quee was out for 105 after the West Indians had been dismissed for 238.

New Zealand make up for poor start

NEW Zealand appeared to have thrown away the advantage of winning the toss at the start of the one-off Test in Christchurch yesterday. Germon, the New Zealand, captain and wicketkeeper, asked Pakistan to bat and they advanced to 135 without loss.

But a valiant effort from Chris Cairns, who took three wickets for three runs in 21 balls just before lunch, precipitated a Pakistan collapse. They were all out for 208 and New Zealand had reached 98 for three by the close.

Aamir Sohail and Ramiz Raja, the Pakistan openers, began fluently but both fell to Cairns for 88 and 54 respectively. The seam bowler went on to take four wickets for 51.

Salim Malik edged Nash to Germon for a second-ball duck and Larsen accounted for Basit Ali and Ijaz Ahmed before Cairns and Morrison mopped up the tail.

The New Zealand openers reached 48 before Young edged Ata-ur-Rehman to Rashid Latif for 16. Wasim Akram and Waqar Younis had wasted the new ball, aiming more at the batsmen's heads than at their stumps, while several half-volleys were driven to the fence.

Spearman was denied a half-century on his debut when Mushtaq Ahmed slipped a leg break between bat and pad. Parore was then caught behind off Ata-ur-Rehman for nine, leaving Fleming and Twose to take New Zealand to the close.

Protesters in a flap about burning Olympic issue

SIMON BARNES

On Saturday

IT WAS perhaps one of the defining moments of Olympic history. At the opening ceremony of the Games in Seoul they released, as is traditional, a flock of white doves: a living item of exterior decor. And symbolic, don't you know? They flew prettily around the stadium for a while. Well, it looked pretty, but the birds were clearly in a state of considerable bewilderment. So instead of flying to all four corners of the world to bring a message of peace and harmony, they stopped to regroup on the nearest available perch, high above the stadium, out of range of all the noise and disturbance below.

Unfortunately, this perch was a cauldron full of oil, which was ignited at the climax of the ceremony: the Olympic flame and all that. And the birds were instantaneously burnt to death. Symbolic, don't you know?

Naturally, as plans for the opening ceremony of the Coca-Cola Olympics march on, they wanted to include more symbolic doves, but animal rights groups in Atlanta have weighed in with a series of protests. The Atlanta Olympic Games Committee has backed down. The Olympics will be a safer place for dovekind.

Coke with a twist

Meanwhile, the latest issue of Olympic Magazine thumped portentously onto the doormat. It is full of worthy stuff about Sport and Art and that sort of thing, and I felt a pang of guilt for all these dreadful, cynical remarks I keep making about the Coca-Cola Games and so on. On page 22, a fascinating article: "Coca-Cola: 110 years of pleasure".

Fascinating stuff. And by one of those mysterious Koestlerian coincidences, there is an advertisement on the back cover for — well, you just try to guess what.

Had the jabs

Nino Benvenuti, a former world middleweight champion and probably the best boxer Italy has produced, has stormed out of his life, left his wife, Teresa, and flown to Calcutta to work with lepers, telling friends: "We're egoists! We're always demanding! We never succeed in giving! I must make my contribution to society, and do it fast!"

So Benvenuti, now 57, is working as a jack of all trades at a Mother Teresa centre. Here, I learn, "they want to understand if Nino really wants to dedicate his whole life to this mission, or if it is just a moment of existential crisis".

Highly strung

I can report on a great triumph for Britain. "Following two days of intense competition," I read breathlessly as the paper unfurled gently from the fax machine, "Britain's champion team, Airkraft, has just won the sixth World Cup Sport Kite Championship in Australia." They are the first non-American team to win. They took first place in both the precision and ballet sections of the event, beating such teams as Aftershock, of Japan, Sky Dance, also British, Kite-O-Holix, of Austria, and Lucky Landing Albatross, of Switzerland. There can't be much wrong with Britain when its young people are the best in the world at flying kites.

Zero-rated

Here are some more fascinating facts about the most important subject in sport: all sums, naturally, in American dollars. Michael Jordan is still the highest-paid sportsman, even though the sum he receives for playing basketball is a mere $3.9 million. He gets a further $40 million in endorsements. Compare and contrast with Mike Tyson, second in the list, who got $40 million for boxing and $0 for endorsements. The biggest gap for nonrapists concerns Jack Nicklaus, who made $0.6 million for playing golf and $14.5 million from endorsements.

United affront

Speaking as a seagull rather than a trawler or a sardine, it comes as no surprise to learn that Eric Cantona has been voted the most hated person in football by the readers of the allegedly grown-up football magazine, FourFourTwo. Alex Ferguson, Cantona's manager at Manchester United, makes third, and Roy Keane, that chicken still looking for a head, from the same club, makes seventh. What does it all mean, I wonder? As Eric himself said: "Le monde des enfants, voila bien ce que je n'aurais jamais du quitter." I wish I had never had to grow up.

Last chance

My final request for magic numbers. This week's Test match has brought us two freshly-minted numbers: 185 for Michael Atherton, and 11 for Jack Russell. Both look good for inclusion. A bottle of blissful Nicolas Feuillatte champagne awaits the winners: closing date for entries is December 15.

Russian overcomes Eltingh and meets Ivanisevic for place in final

Kafelnikov finds strength to survive

FROM STUART JONES
TENNIS CORRESPONDENT
IN MUNICH

THE rigours of the past three weeks, which were too much for Pete Sampras to withstand, have not yet incapacitated Yevgeny Kafelnikov. To close the year, the two tennis players adhered to the same schedule — the ATP tour championship finals in Frankfurt, the Davis Cup final in Moscow and now the Grand Slam Cup here. Having lost the first set of his quarter-final to Jacco Eltingh, the Russian came back to win 3-6, 6-3, 6-2.

No aspersions should be cast on the veracity of Sampras's reason for his withdrawal on Thursday, which offered Goran Ivanisevic a day off to prepare for his semi-final against Kafelnikov today. Nevertheless, the American brought into question the powers of his physical endurance. Since Frankfurt, he had played on average a match every three days.

Kafelnikov has carried the additional burden of almost unremitting failure. On the medium-paced carpet in Frankfurt, he lost all three of his round-robin matches, the first of them to Sampras in straight sets. He went down to him again, crucially as it transpired, in the second Davis Cup rubber on the slow Russian clay.

Since Kafelnikov's fragility lies in his mind, it was doubtful whether he would be able to sustain a challenge here for a prize which is worth more money than prestige. Yet, of the eight winners in the first round, he alone avoided the lottery of a tie-break, beating Renzo Furlan 6-4, 6-1.

His temperament was under a more searching examination when Eltingh took control of the net and of the opening set. Kafelnikov ominously double-faulted once to give the Dutchman a 2-0 lead and again to offer him a 4-0 lead. Capitulation, at that stage, seemed to be feasible.

Eltingh, 25, though ranked no higher than No 43 in the world, is capable of beating anybody. In each of the past two years he has recorded victories over Sampras and, in the first round here, he knocked out Michael Chang, whose record in the tournament is unsurpassed for its consistency.

That is the one quality lacking in Eltingh, a man evidently made for the big occasion. After reaching the quarter-finals of the Australian Open, he was eliminated in the first round of his next seven events. After reaching the quarter-final at Wimbledon, he was beaten by his next four opponents.

Not until he was 3-2 down and 40-0 up in the second set, after an unusual sequence of 23 successive points going with service, did Eltingh's composure begin to crack. It was disturbed by an opponent who suddenly found his range, particularly on his two-fisted backhand returns.

"He just smoked four of them on my first serve," Eltingh reflected and admitted that they contributed to his subsequent error, a double fault. "That wasn't pretty but it was more the points before that he had played so well. I felt I had to do something extra and I went for it."

Similar pressure was applied, decisively, midway through the third set. With another double fault, his fifth, Eltingh fell 3-2 behind. His spirit was broken and he paid tribute to that of Kafelnikov. "He showed mental strength," he said. "He was in the mood to fight, to play hard." In spite of his lack of success in Frankfurt and a second successive failure to capture the Davis Cup in his capital city, Kafelnikov has achieved no more than he expected here. "When I saw the draw, I thought I could reach the semis," he said, before adding pointedly: "But I didn't think I could go further."

On a surface which has been criticised for being too quick, the odds clearly lie in favour of the big-serving Ivanisevic, especially as he will be comparatively fresh. For the same reason, Boris Becker promises to beat Todd Martin in the other semi-final, though the margin is likely to be significantly narrower.

SPORT IN BRIEF

Henman gets Britain off to flying start

BRITAIN overwhelmed Slovenia in their opening match of the European men's team tennis championship first division in Dublin yesterday, winning 3-0 without losing a set. Tim Henman, who has recently moved into the world's top 100 at 98, easily overcame Marko Por 6-2, 6-3 in the first match and Greg Rusedski, the Britain No 1, who is ranked world No 38, defeated Borut Urh 6-3, 6-4 to give his team a winning lead. In the doubles, Mark Petchey and Neil Broad beat Por and Urh 6-4, 7-6 to complete the rout.

Though Slovenia were without Iztok Bozic, their top-ranked player, the match was a useful dress rehearsal for Britain, who meet them again in the Davis Cup Euro-African Zone group two first round at Newcastle next May. Today Britain play Ireland and tomorrow they face Israel. If they win both matches, they will be promoted to the champions' division. The second-placed team stays in the first division, while the bottom two are relegated.

O'Malley leads way

GOLF: Peter O'Malley, of Australia, returned a three-under-par 67 yesterday to take a one-shot lead into the third round of the New Zealand Open championship. O'Malley has a total of 132, eight under par over two rounds, at The Grange course in Auckland. His compatriots, Robert Stephens and Stephen Moriarty — who recorded the event's best round of 63 — are one shot off the lead. Doug Dunakey, an early joint leader with 65, had a 72 in the second round and is among a group on 137, five shots off the lead. O'Malley, 30, a former New Zealand amateur champion and winner of the 1992 Scottish Open, is seeking his first win in Australasia, even though he had a good season in Europe, finishing tenth on the money list. "I'll just try to get off to a solid start tomorrow and keep going," O'Malley said — who rattled in four birdies on the front nine yesterday.

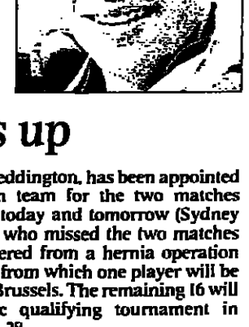

Schulz confident

BOXING: Axel Schulz, of Germany, goes into his bout against Frans Botha, of South Africa, in Stuttgart today, quietly confident of clinching the vacant International Boxing Federation world heavyweight title on a points decision. The South African, however, predicts that an early knockout will give him the crown abdicated by George Foreman, who won the title in a controversial points decision over Schulz in April and then retired rather than defend it. Botha, who lives in the United States, has won all 35 of his fights — 21 by knockouts.

Scots bid to retain title

CURLING: Scotland launch their attempt to retain the men's European curling championship title in Grindelwald, Switzerland, this weekend, with Hammy McMillan skipper to Mike Hay, Norman Brown and Roger McIntyre. Should the Stranraer-based squad win the final next Saturday, it will be the first European back-to-back success by the same squad. However, after an unbeatable start to the season, the quartet have shown indifferent form recently. England, though, strengthened by Alan McDougall, the former world junior champion, could surprise better-fancied opposition.

Testing time for Male

RACKETS: James Male, right, the world champion, faces his toughest test so far when he meets the rapidly-improving Guy Barker in the semi-final of the Lacoste British amateur championship at the Queen's Club today. Barker, who put out the injured third seed, John Prenn, in the quarter-finals, is playing some of his best rackets. Willie Boone, the holder, faces fellow Etonian, Mark Hue Williams, who put out the fourth seed, Rupert Owen Browne.

Laslett steps up

HOCKEY: Jason Laslett, of Teddington, has been appointed captain of the Great Britain team for the two matches against Belgium in Brussels today and tomorrow (Sydney Friskin writes). Julian Halls, who missed the two matches against Argentina, has recovered from a hernia operation and is back in the squad of 17 from which one player will be dropped after the matches in Brussels. The remaining 16 will go forward to the Olympic qualifying tournament in Barcelona from January 19 to 28.

Former champion dies

SPEEDWAY: Jack Milne, who became the sport's second world champion when he won the title at Wembley in 1937, has died at his home in California. Milne, 88, retained his links with speedway right up to his death, holding a position as a director of the company which promoted the 1982 world championships at the Coliseum, Los Angeles. When he won the title his elder brother, Cordy, finished third, which remains the only occasion on which brothers have stood on the winners' rostrum at the world championships.

Higgins gets lost in fog on reaching the 'twilight zone

Oliver Holt travels to Basildon to witness an inauspicious debut as the Hurricane tries blowing in a different direction

Alex Higgins began a new phase of his turbulent career in front of 73 spectators yesterday. The setting was a characterless warehouse on a bleak patch of land outside Basildon, in Essex; a tattoo convention was on next door but he seemed oblivious to the surroundings. This was the Hurricane's tournament debut as a pool player and the images of Fast Eddie Felson and Minnesota Fats bouncing around inside his mind were all he needed to motivate him.

It was called the Festival Hall, the venue for this comeback of sorts, but it looked more like a failed disco, all matt black walls, idle video games and a couple of long bars. There was a smokey practice room containing one table and no one seemed to notice the Irishman as he warmed up for his afternoon doubles match. It is a twilight world, this, the kind of sport inhabited by men with names like Machine Gun Lou and Baby Face Gulyassy, the sort of place where snooker players go to die.

'The sort of place where snooker players go to die'

But Higgins, who was world snooker champion in 1972 and 1982, is raging against the dying of his light. His entrance into the makeshift arena was greeted with a thick fog of dry ice, a blast of rock music and wild applause and stamping feet from the audience. The public still love him, even if there are not as many of them as before.

It is easy to imagine the Irishman, 46, slipping into the pool world, drifting around on a small-time tour, sinking ever more deeply into decline, but Higgins says he has no interest in taking up the game permanently. Barry Hearn, the promoter, persuaded him to play this weekend for Europe against America in the Mosconi Cup alongside his old sparring partners, Jimmy White and Steve Davis, and that is it, Higgins said. "Alex is in as a wild card and you can't get much wilder than that," Hearn said. "It's going to be a riot."

Before he wandered across the car park for his first game, an afternoon nine-ball doubles match which he and his partner lost comprehensively, Higgins sat in the bar of his hotel — "I might as well have a quick one while I'm waiting" — and admitted that he knew very little about pool. A pub near his home in Stockport had got a table in specially for him to practise on, but he only got hold of the rules two weeks ago and he was playing with a mate's cue. "He's short and tubby," Higgins explained. "That's why the cue is so thick. It makes my snooker cue look like a knitting needle."

There were, though, things that attracted him about the sport: "In some ways, it would probably suit me, because it's more an endurance game. You can imagine Paul Newman, the hustler, playing Minnesota Fats. Their matches might last for a couple of days and that is how it should be in snooker: the best player is the one left with all the money and the room's empty and him and his mate say, 'Next place'.

"Basically, pool's OK for a laugh in a pub but it doesn't turn me on. There are too many conflicting rules. It's like trying to pass an A-level."

After the Mosconi Cup finishes tomorrow, next stop is the January qualifying tournament for next year's snooker world championships. But Higgins is preoccupied with 19 charges he has laid against the World Professional Billiards and Snooker Association. He will not say what the charges allege but he is upset about things like lost earnings.

Those lost earnings include £1,000 for urinating on a flower display during a late-night practice session for the Benson and Hedges Irish Masters in 1982 and £12,000 for head-butting the tournament director at the Tennents UK Open in 1986. He also once threatened to have his countryman, Dennis Taylor, shot.

It is all part of the baggage he carries around with him and the crowd expect him to perform outrageously now. "Come on Alex, turn it on," a bullying voice shouted from the crowd yesterday when one shot was less than perfect. But it will not stop him fighting for a return to the limelight. "I just want a level playing field," he said. "But the authorities keep moving the goalposts."

Victory by McManus puts Scots firmly in control

FROM PHIL YATES
IN FRANKFURT

FOR the second time in three world-ranking events, a trio of Scottish players reached the semi-finals when Alan McManus joined Stephen Hendry and John Higgins in the last four of the German Open here yesterday.

McManus, unexpectedly beaten by Paul Hunter, a first-year professional, in the last 64 of the United Kingdom championships, defeated David Roe 5-3 in a match as scrappy as it was predictable.

The Scot, who has experimented with his stance and general technique since winning his last title, the 1994 Dubai Classic, looked rock-solid in the first frame as he compiled a 69 break from little more than a half-chance.

He also won a low-scoring second frame but Roe, attempting to feature in the semi-finals of a ranking tournament for the first time, found his range and made breaks of 51 and 55 to level at 2-2.

The mid-session interval was perfectly timed for McManus, though, who moved 4-2 ahead on the resumption before winning a disjointed eighth frame for victory.

"It wasn't a classic but I am not an aggressive player and I had to play to my strengths, which meant containing David," McManus said. "I'll have to improve to stand a chance of beating John in the semi-finals."

McManus has lost four of his five previous meetings with Higgins, including three defeats this season. Higgins beat him 9-7 at the corresponding stage of the Grand Prix and 5-4 in the last 16 of the Thailand Classic after trailing 4-1.

Hendry, who has not experienced defeat since the semi-finals of the same Thailand Classic in early October, extended his winning sequence to 15 matches by beating Rod Lawler, of Liverpool, 5-3 on Thursday night.

Hendry now needs to overcome Ken Doherty or Mark Bennett tonight to become the first player this season to exceed £250,000 in prize-money. He has lost only once in his last 29 matches, stretching back to April.

Minnows hope to net giants of basketball

BY NICHOLAS HARLING

THE fourth round of the National Cup, the equivalent in basketball of the FA Cup third round in football, when the leading teams play for the first time, tips off this weekend with the leading three first division clubs harbouring realistic hopes of springing surprise results.

The trio, the last survivors from outside the Budweiser League, all face opponents who have struggled this season; none more so than Hemel Hempstead Royals, who are at home to Coventry Crusaders. Mark Dunning, the Royals' coach, who has watched his squad lose their last 11 league and cup games, said: "They'll be looking at our record and fancying their chances. It's up to us to make sure it doesn't happen. We have to sustain a 40-minute game."

Too often in recent weeks, Dunning has watched his players squander big leads, once to Thames Valley Tigers, the cup runners-up last year, who, this time round, go to Ware none too confident of success after a run of inconsistent form.

Crystal Palace, the unbeaten first division leaders, have an intriguing home tie against Doncaster Panthers that evokes memories of the times when the two clubs monopolised the National Cup.

They competed in the first three finals, Doncaster narrowly taking the first in 1979 before Palace swept to convincing victories over the next two years.

Coached now by Alton Byrd, who is still playing at 37, Palace would appear to have every chance of appearing in the quarter-final draw on Monday. "It's going to be tough, no question about it," Mark Harvey, the Panthers' player-coach, said.

Derby Storm receive London Towers, the league leaders, in the most attractive of the ties contested by Budweiser League clubs.

Birmingham Bullets should just have the edge over Leicester City Riders in the all-Midlands tussle and there will be a surprise tomorrow if the holders, Sheffield Sharks, do not reach the last eight at the expense of Chester Jets.

Chaloner learns the hard way

FROM COLIN MCQUILLAN IN BOMBAY

MARK CHALONER may have learnt a valuable lesson under the stars here yesterday evening. He lost a second-round match in the Mahindra Challenge 15-11, 15-12, 15-12 to Rodney Eyles, the top-seeded defending champion from Australia. It was men and boys for 47 minutes on the hot open-air squash court at the Cricket Club of India.

Chaloner, at 24, is a phenomenal mover. He had delighted the Indian crowd the night before, hunting down everything that Federico Usandizaga, of Argentina, could throw at him. There were a few innocents impressed enough to wager heavily on a first tournament victory for the youngster from Lincoln, who clinched England's first world team championship victory in Cairo last month.

Eyles had a difficult first-round encounter with Martin Heath, of Scotland. He was hesitant and a bit lucky to survive. Chaloner was therefore required to suffer both to re-establish the Australian's local image and, more importantly, to remind him that all he has achieved so far is a good start to a fledgling professional career.

This is an Englishman who can run forever, so Eyles gave him nothing after which to run. He has very fast hands, so Eyles played everything to his feet. He reads the shots very early, so Eyles changed them very late. It was old-fashioned Brisbane squash and it was very plain that Lincoln's young hero had never met it before.

At one vital stage of the second game, with Chaloner thinking on his feet and cutting his way almost experimentally first to 4-1 and then to 7-3, Eyles began to float the ball around the upper reaches of the transparent glass walls. He was 11-7 up on errors before the youngster tuned in to the new dimension.

"We've all had it done to us," Eyles said afterwards with a satisfied grin. "As you get a bit older, you learn to save the running for when it really works. He'll remember this for a while whenever we meet. It makes its mark."

England's hopes were revived later in the evening with Mark Cairns, Simon Parke and Chris Walker all progressing to the quarter-finals.

Olympic champion at centre of controversy over annual athletics awards

'Vote-rigging' cost Gunnell award

BY DAVID MILLER IN MONTE CARLO, JOHN GOODBODY AND DAVID POWELL

SALLY GUNNELL was deprived of one of the world's most important athletics awards because an International Amateur Athletic Federation (IAAF) official fixed the voting, it was reported yesterday.

Christopher Winner, the former IAAF press officer, claims that Gunnell, who won the European and Commonwealth 400 metres hurdles titles last year to complete the grand slam having won world and Olympic gold medals, lost the award as the IAAF's 1994 female Athlete of the Year and Colin Jackson was dropped from second to fourth place in the mens' poll, because it was discovered that neither British hurdler was planning to attend the annual presentation dinner in Monte Carlo.

Primo Nebiolo, the IAAF president, last night denied the claims, which came as his federation was preparing for this year's ceremony in Monte Carlo this evening, which will be televised in 74 countries. "If Gunnell was the winner, we would have been very happy," Nebiolo said. "She's an appealing girl, a great fighter on the track. She has done a lot for athletics, and I admire her very much."

"If she had been the winner, we would have done the same as for Carl Lewis in 1991, when we televised him at the dinner live from California. It was more spectacular than had he been present here in Monte Carlo."

Winner, who resigned from his position after 15 months in June, told the USA Today newspaper that Gunnell was voted top in the 1994 annual poll, held among journalists and officials across the world. However, she ended up fourth as Jackie Joyner-Kersee, the American heptathlon world-record holder, was given the award.

Winner is quoted as saying that Nebiolo telephoned him about the voting. "I told him about the situation and he said 'Oh, no, not the Englishwoman again'." Winner said that 10 days later he received 30 ballots on his desk, in an unmarked envelope — all naming Joyner-Kersee as the top woman. This gave her enough votes to pass Gunnell. He said he was later ordered to accept the late ballots.

For the men, the late ballots did not affect the winner or Jackson's second place to Nourredine Morceli, the world 1500 metres record-holder from Algeria. However, Winner said he was told by an IAAF official to drop Jackson to fourth place in any case.

While the IAAF claims 1,500 voters for the award, Winner said only 288 ballots were originally returned in the 1994 poll. Winner said he still possesses the 30 late ballots, which he said were incomplete and all in the same handwriting. Winner explained that the results were changed because neither Gunnell nor Jackson planned to attend the 1994 event and the IAAF wanted to ensure that the top three vote-winners were present to make it more attractive for television.

Winner said: "I take full responsibility for executing orders. One year later, I can only express shame for participating in what amounts to gross vote-rigging. I should have resigned then. I can offer only apologies to the athletes penalised."

Nebiolo said: "Why does Christopher Winner not produce the evidence? Was there some secret about the papers? He stayed with us until June, so why did he not say anything previously? I am not responsible for the ballot procedure, but I would like to speak with Winner to understand what happened."

When told of Winner's claims, Istvan Gyulai, the IAAF general secretary, said: "Come on, this is childish."

Jonathan Marks, Gunnell's manager, said: "From the athletes' point of view, and Sally's point of view, there is a certain amount of cynicism as to how these decisions are arrived at. They are as much to fit the marketing needs of the people who are putting the event on.

"When she heard the news there was an element of surprise. But I cannot say there was undue upset or concern because, at the moment, she has other things on her mind." Gunnell is getting back to fitness after injury wiped out her 1995 season.

Gunnell had won the award in 1993. "When I spoke to her, there was not any upset or annoyance. Maybe that underlines the regard the athletes have for the IAAF — that she was not really surprised," Marks said.

He said that Gunnell had not attended last year because she had been to the previous two galas and the IAAF "never flagged it as an issue." However, Jackson, the 1994 European and Commonwealth champion, said he would be "very surprised" if the allegations were true.

This is not the first time that Nebiolo has been involved in controversy. At the 1987 world championships in Rome, Italian officials attempted to fix the result of the long jump so that Giovanni Evangelisti finished third. Nebiolo declined to institute any serious inquiry and refused to accept any responsibility for the incident despite damning criticism in the independent investigation by the Italian Olympic Committee.

A leading contender for this year's men's award is Jonathan Edwards, the British triple-jumper.

Harlequins make some progress as Gallagher gets to play

BY DAVID HANDS
RUGBY CORRESPONDENT

JOHN GALLAGHER, the former New Zealand rugby union full back who turned to rugby league in 1990, will play for Harlequins today after his reinstatement by the Rugby Football Union (RFU) executive committee.

Gallagher, 31, played in the Ieuan Evans testimonial match at Llanelli last month and was one of ten former rugby league players applying for reinstatement. However, the RFU's edict does not extend to competitive rugby; he and players such as former England internationals Nigel Heslop and Peter Williams, both of Orrell, can appear in other matches but not in the league or cup this season.

Thus the Stoop Memorial Ground today, where Rosslyn Park are the visitors, will not witness the gala occasion which Cardiff made of Jonathan Davies's return from rugby league. Both Wales and Ireland, who have expressed a keen interest in Gallagher since his parents are both Irish, would have allowed him to play in competitions straightaway but England continue to enforce their moratorium on open rugby below representative level.

Welsh exodus 41

Gallagher, who won 18 caps for the All Blacks before joining Leeds, is the highest-profile player to re-appear in English rugby. Pat Whelan, the Ireland manager, is sending a selector to London to see if, after five years, there are signs that Gallagher can recapture the form which made him the international player of the year in 1989.

"It's half a step forward," Dick Best, the Harlequins director of rugby, said. "We want him to play in league games. I thought the RFU might slap a 120-day qualification period on him, which would have been sensible.

"I'll have to discuss with John and our legal advisers whether to take this any further, but that would be a last resort."

☐ In a further rapprochement between the two codes, Orrell may play their league match with Leicester at Wigan's Central Park ground on March 30.

Russell's dance continues but Gough sits it out

FROM ALAN LEE
CRICKET CORRESPONDENT
IN PAARL

PAARL (second day of four): Boland, with six first-innings wickets in hand, are 273 runs behind an England XI

HIGH on the adrenalin of their Test escape, England asked for little from this low-key game among the Cape mountains. A few runs from John Crawley and a few wickets for Darren Gough would have done nicely. But the laws of perversity apply at times such as this and, after the first-day failure of Crawley, Gough's disconsolate departure from the ground yesterday with an untimely hamstring injury carried an air of the pre-ordained.

There was limited consolation in a century from the remarkable Jack Russell, or in his unbroken ninth-wicket stand of 169 with Richard Illingworth. Even victory, which the spin of Illingworth and Mike Watkinson may provide over the weekend, cannot compensate for the reassurance that England have sought.

England remain a few pieces short of the complete jigsaw and, if the No 3 position now passed to Crawley is one of those proving elusive, another is that of fourth bowler. Gough's hold on the job is tenuous, the more so after his opportunity to restore confidence with the ball was aborted midway through his fourth over.

Gough, whose game depends so much upon his fluctuating levels of self-esteem, suffered a mortifying Test match in Johannesburg and had a good deal to redeem here. That he may now have no chance to do it before this game ends, suggests his Test career is about to suffer another interruption.

The third Test in Durban, which starts on Thursday, is looming as the pivotal game of the series. It is expected to produce a result and it is expected that the quicker bowlers will decide it. England can afford to employ only their best and most reliable bowlers in such circumstances. First reports from the dressing-room of a tight hamstring were amended to a strain at the back of the right knee and later, confusingly, to a combination of the two. Gough, who returned to the field briefly before tea, took no part after the break. Raymond Illingworth, the tour manager, explained: "It is something he has been feeling for a while, a tightness almost like cramp. We don't think it is serious but it is a worry, because Darren needed a long bowl here. He's not been bowling a good line."

England are now going to find it difficult to accommodate the gifted but accident-prone Gough in Durban, with potentially bruising consequences for the standing of a man who felt he had emerged from a disorientating summer. At his best, Gough is a rare drawcard but when his rhythm gives way to blues, he can present a forlorn figure.

Yesterday, perhaps symbolically, he left off his sunglasses and his bright blue wristwatch to bowl. Many would say this was an improvement, but it was almost as if he was already feeling off-colour. Once he had trudged off, the evidence against him continued to mount as Peter Martin bowled an impressive spell in his stead. Maintaining a demanding off-stump line and swinging the new ball, Martin took one wicket, through a catch at third slip, and was unlucky to have several plausible leg-before appeals rejected. He remains behind Mark Ilott in the pecking order, though perhaps not by much.

Illingworth, introduced for the fourteenth over, bowled unchanged to the close. He will never be an exciting spin bowler to watch but he deserved his two wickets, even if the second of them contained a degree of doubt. Television replays indicated that Terence Lazard's foot was firmly back in his crease when Russell claimed the stumping.

This, though, was Russell's day, as many have been on this tour. His characteristic hundred, the fifth of his first-class career, inflated his average here to 94. He has batted more than ten hours this week, without being out, though this innings was somewhat quicker than his adhesive efforts in the Test. In an hour longer, he made precisely 100 more runs.

Beckenbauer and Bayern delighted to draw Forest

BY DAVID MADDOCK

IF further evidence was required about English football's plummeting status, it was provided by Franz Beckenbauer yesterday when he surveyed the draw for the quarter-finals of the Uefa Cup. The Bayern Munich president could barely conceal his delight when he learnt that his club had been paired with Nottingham Forest.

That Forest are England's only representative in the three European competitions speaks volumes, and Beckenbauer's words merely embellished a depressing story. "Good. It is a very good draw, it could have been very much more difficult," he said. "The task seems solvable to me. It is a game that we can win."

Frank Clark's durable Forest side will be presented with their toughest assignment so far when they visit Munich for the first leg on March 7. The return at the City Ground two weeks later heralds the return of Jürgen Klinsmann to English soil for the first time since his acrimonious departure from Tottenham Hotspur in the summer.

Much has been said, particularly by Alan Sugar, the Tottenham chairman, about the eagerness of the Germany international to escape these shores, but Klinsmann offered a different perspective by announcing his delight with the draw. "It is good because it means I will be playing in England again, and that is a happy prospect for me, although I know it is a difficult match," he said.

Uefa Cup

Bayern Munich v Nottingham Forest
First leg March 6, second leg March 19
Cup Winners' Cup
Dynamo Moscow v Rapid Vienna
Parma v Paris Saint-Germain
Deportivo La Coruña v Real Zaragoza
Borussia Mönchengladbach v Feyenoord
First leg March 7, second leg March 21

For the Forest manager, the visit to the Olympic Stadium is sure to evoke happy memories of the time when Europe still feared English club sides. His greatest football moment came when he lifted the European Cup as a Forest player in the same stadium against Malmö in 1979.

His thoughts now are concentrated on how to deal with the menace of Klinsmann, who scored four goals in the last round against Benfica. "Klinsmann surprised people when he came to England because they thought he was just a diver, a cheat," Clark said. "Now, though, we can appreciate just how good he really is. He is one of the best strikers in the world, and it is obvious that if we stop him, it will do our chances a power of good."

Both sides will be relieved to have avoided AC Milan. Bordeaux have the dubious honour of meeting the Italians. Five former European Cup holders have survived to the last eight of the competition, with Barcelona and PSV providing possibly the tie of the round. Roma complete the draw when they visit Slavia Prague in the first leg.

Everton's conquerors in the Cup Winners' Cup, Feyenoord, face Borussia Mönchengladbach. Real Zaragoza, who beat Arsenal in the final last season with a remarkable last-minute goal from Nayim, and who are attempting to go one step further than them by becoming the first club to retain the trophy, meet Deportivo La Coruña, although the highlight of the quarter-finals is the contest between Parma and Paris Saint-Germain. Rapid Vienna visit Moscow to face Dynamo in the remaining fixture.

Rangers' dreams of being involved in a European final are about to be fulfilled. Sadly for the Scottish club and its supporters, the team will not be involved, but Ibrox will host the Cup Winners' Cup final on May 8. The European Cup final will be played in Rome on May 22.

Panel forces statement on South Wales Electricity

Welsh Water poised for bid

BY CHRISTINE BUCKLEY

THE electricity takeover race moved to Wales yesterday when Welsh Water was forced to declare its intentions towards South Wales Electricity. It would be the ninth takeover bid for a regional electricity company in less than a year, leaving only Yorkshire, East Midlands and London Electricity without a bid.

The intention to bid came a week after Ian Lang, President of the Board of Trade, cleared the takeover of North West Electricity by North West Water.

Welsh Water, which serves most of the principality, said it had been looking at a takeover of its southern electricity neighbour and would value the shares at £10.20p.

Shares in South Wales Elec-

The sale of any utility on the Celtic fringe, vide the fumbled attempts to privatise Scottish water, must be fraught with political risk. But the marriage of two Welsh companies can be pictured as a marriage of mutual support, as Cymru against all comers.
Pennington, page 27

Wynford Evans, chairman of South Wales Electricity, right, with former chief executive David Jones. The company has advised shareholders to take no action tricity, which began the week at 926p, rose 70p to £10.58 after the announcement, as traders speculated on the possibility of a higher offer from a third party. Welsh Water's shares fell 30p to 724p.

Yesterday's announcement, which was prompted by the Takeover Panel after movement in South Wales Electricity share price, is the second time Welsh Water has shown a clear interest in its utility neighbour. Shortly after privatisation of the electricity companies in 1991 Welsh bought a stake of 14.9 per cent with a view to combining the businesses. However, regulatory concerns forced it to abandon the project and it sold the interest, making a £17 million profit, two years later.

Welsh Water said its board "has yet to reach a decision on whether, and if so when, to make any proposals to the board of South Wales Electricity." South Wales, which is being advised by NM Rothschild advised shareholders "to take no action."

The announcement from Welsh Water came only two days after the Texas utility Central and South West Corporation bid £1.6 billion for Seeboard.

Although Welsh Water denied that it had made a formal approach to South Wales Electricity, it is likely that an approach, however informal, may have been made for Welsh to have determined a valuation which prices the target company at £1.04 billion.

The potential offer price is at the lower end of those already made for electricity companies and other bidders may weigh in with higher offers. There is a feeling in the market that with the number of electricity companies available for takeover falling fast, bidders will grow more hungry. CSW surprised many on Monday with the level of its offer for Seeboard when it put £1.6 billion on the table, which meant £12.70 a share allowing for adjustment after Seeboard's share split, in what was intended as a knock-out bid.

Houston Industries, CSW's former bidding partner, is known to be still actively seeking a UK electricity company after its offer for Norweb with CSW failed.

But, for cultural and historical reasons, Welsh Water is hopeful that South Wales will be more disposed to being taken over by another Welsh operation than an outside body such as a US utility.

Analysts expect that cost savings of at least £60 million could be made from linking the two Welsh utilities after a steady programme of cost reductions by the electricity company, which has cut spending by 5 per cent a year and reduced its staff by 30 per cent since privatisation.

One difficulty in valuing a full bid for South Wales is its burgeoning cable television and telecoms business, which has 600,000 homes in its area and has already connected almost 100,000. Any bid would have to include a view on that venture's eventual value. The company owns 40 per cent of CableTel.

Banker tackles talk of takeover

BY PATRICIA TEHAN
BANKING CORRESPONDENT

SIR Evelyn de Rothschild, chairman of NM Rothschild, one of the few independent merchant banks left in the City of London, has moved to end speculation of a takeover by NatWest, saying that the family remained committed to the independence of the bank.

In a short press statement, Sir Evelyn also said that the family intended to retain control of the Rothschilds Continuation holding company.

However, there was speculation last night that Sir Evelyn's words were carefully chosen and that he would not rule out the sale of a stake in the bank, provided the family retained control.

Sun Alliance and Eagle Star, the insurers, have minority shareholdings of 20 per cent and 5 per cent, respectively, in NM Rothschild. Eagle Star used to have 15 per cent, but sold part of its stake to Sun Alliance 14 months ago.

Sir Evelyn is understood to be happy to discuss how Rothschild might enter co-operative arrangements or joint ventures with third parties. However, observers said that it was hard to see potential partners for Rothschild in London other than NatWest.

Since selling its 26 per cent stake in Smith New Court, the stockbroker, to Merrill Lynch in summer, Rothschild has seen its role as that of independent financial adviser. However, there are doubts in the City about how long a bank of Rothschild's size without any distribution capability can continue to win such mandates as ENI, the Italian energy privatisation.

The collapse of Barings, and sales such as that of Kleinwort Benson to Dresdner Bank, have fuelled speculation that it will not be feasible for Rothschild to stay independent.

Tobacco lights up BAT figures

BY ALASDAIR MURRAY

HUGE growth in cigarette profits lit up BAT's nine-month figures yesterday, as the tobacco and insurance conglomerate announced record profits of £1.8 billion, up 22 per cent on last year.

Tobacco profits increased 34 per cent to £1.2 billion, with sales growing 20 per cent, while, on the financial services side, profits increased 19 per cent to £789 million.

BAT shrugged off the legal and political difficulties faced by Brown and Williamson, its American subsidiary. The company is fighting a multi-billion-dollar lawsuit brought by former smokers and President Clinton's attempt to bring tobacco under the auspices of the Food and Drug Administration.

Martin Broughton, chief executive and deputy chairman, said: "There have been seven previous attempts to bring tobacco under the jurisdiction of the FDA since 1980. All of them have foundered in Congress." The strong performance in tobacco was boosted by BAT's acquisition of American Tobacco and its integration into Brown and Williamson. Volumes in the US were up 60 per cent, with American Tobacco contributing about two thirds of the growth, in spite of a steady 2 per cent decline in the overall US tobacco market.

International brand sales were up 20 per cent and particular progress was made in Far Eastern and East European markets. BAT is aiming to further improve its international performance through the management reorganisation announced earlier this week.

The one black spot was the performance of Allied Dunbar, its UK insurance subsidiary, where new business premium incomes fell 18 per cent and profits were down 13 per cent at £108 million.

Diamond prices to increase

DIAMOND prices are being raised for the first time in almost three years (Colin Campbell writes).

De Beers is raising the price of rough diamonds that are two carats and larger by an average 5 per cent with effect from November 28.

It is the first formal price increase De Beers has made since February 1993, when rough prices were increased by an average 1.5 per cent.

The 5 per cent price increase, announced by the group's Central Selling Organisation marketing arm, has been "welcomed and well accepted" by the trade, De Beers said. The impact of a 5 per cent increase will be positive for diamond producers of larger carats.

In the run-up to the traditionally busy Christmas season, diamond retail sales are said to be strong.

Annual CSO sales figures for 1995 are due to be announced by De Beers on December 13.

CBI abandons Tory support

BY PHILIP BASSETT, INDUSTRIAL EDITOR

CBI leaders are to abandon the time-honoured support of British business for the Conservatives in the run-up to the general election in favour of strict political neutrality. The move will be seen as a significant shift towards Labour.

CBI leaders insist that the prospect of a real fight in the forthcoming election means that key business issues such as Britain's industrial competitiveness are bound to become politically contentious, so the only proper course for the CBI to follow is one of rigorous political even-handedness.

At the same time, the CBI is to set up inquiries on short-termism in the economy and on what business leaders see as the lacklustre performance of the Government's Private Finance Initiative on private-sector funding for major infrastructure projects.

In an interview in advance of the CBI's annual conference, which opens in Birmingham at the weekend, Adair Turner, the new CBI Director-General, says that the confederation has "no alternative" but to pursue a strictly politically neutral line in the run-up to the general election, though he accepts that some CBI members may see that as a shift away from the natural support by business for the Conservatives.

In the last election, CBI leaders came out clearly in support of the Conservatives — with some business leaders actively urging industry to back the Government.

Mr Turner's insistence on a neutral stance is in line with a high and growing degree of business interest in Labour's policies as it continues to maintain its big opinion poll lead, though business still has strong reservations about specific Labour policies such as the minimum wage and signing the European social chapter.

Bank holds out against interest rate cut

George: taking softer line

BY JANET BUSH
ECONOMICS CORRESPONDENT

THE Bank of England yesterday softened its line on inflation but is still holding out against advising the Government to cut interest rates. Bank of England economists now believe that the Government is more likely to hit its inflation target than at the time of the last Inflation Report in August.

In yesterday's Inflation Report, the Bank predicted that inflation in two years' time is still likely to be a fraction above the 2.5 per cent target. Mervyn King, director of economics, made it clear that the Bank would have to predict inflation below 2.5 per cent in two years' time before it shifted its advice in favour of lower interest rates.

In September, the Bank pulled back from advising the Government to raise interest rates. In August, it counselled the Government to raise interest rates in order to hit its target. But yesterday the Bank said that the risks, which in August tended to suggest that inflation could be higher than the Bank's central projection, were now more evenly balanced because of the slowdown in economic growth.

Mr King said: "The risks are now evenly balanced. That is why our advice on interest rates changed in September to wait and see." He said that monetary policy should not aim to deliver inflation well below 2.5 per cent and that the likelihood of missing this target by a small margin was not an argument for changing interest rates.

Mr King refused to be drawn on the Bank's attitude towards disappointing public borrowing figures so far this year and, in that context, towards tax cuts in the Budget. But he hinted that the Bank would not be unduly concerned if a deviation from the Government's forecast for the public sector borrowing requirement was due simply to weak economic growth, which could be reversed.

Markets reacted favourably to yesterday's Inflation Report. Gilts rose because of the renewed possibility of an interest rate cut. December long gilt futures rose 21/32 to 108. Sterling edged higher against the dollar at $1.5818, taking the trade weighted index up from 84.2 to 84.3.

Virtual University may boost skills in motor industry

By Philip Bassett, Industrial Editor

THE Government and leaders of Britain's car parts industry are set to launch a radical new initiative, called the "Virtual University", aimed at improving the performance of a key sector of the economy that is seen as lagging the UK's principal competitors.

The move, thought to be the first of its kind in Britain, builds on another industrial first of a specific partnership, known as the Industry Forum, between the Department of Trade and Industry and leading makers of car components.

However, the move by the DTI is likely to be criticised by Labour as a clear copy of some of the proposals for a University for Industry, using computer and Internet technology, being made by Gordon Brown, the Shadow Chancellor.

Ministers, civil servants and leaders of the car parts industry and the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders have held preliminary talks on establishing the Virtual University, initially for the components industry, but with the aim of extending it, if successful, to other sectors of industry.

The Virtual University will make heavy use of computer links between universities and individual companies, including such firms as the component maker Unipart, a leading advocate of continuous workplace training with its own Unipart University. It will draw together experts from various organisations into a central "body" without such a body actually being formed.

Ministers and industry leaders believe that a virtual body, drawing extensively on high-technology linkages, offers the advantages of pooling expertise to boost the performance of the car parts industry without the disadvantage of a costly centralised bureaucracy.

Tim Eggar, the Industry Minister, said yesterday that the DTI was "exploring" the idea of the Virtual University with the components industry, although, speaking after addressing a DTI/SMMT conference in Birmingham on competitiveness and component-making, he emphasised that it was at a very early stage. He rejected the idea that it had been drawn from Labour's University for Industry plan.

The idea of the Virtual University drew support from key industry leaders. Ian Gibson, the chief executive of Nissan, the Japanese motor manufacturer based in the North-East, told the conference that the VU would help to "ensure that our skill levels throughout the industry are right for the future".

Mr Gibson said later: "The idea is to create a pool of knowledge, resource and learning with which we can raise our industry's game."

The idea of the Virtual University comes out of the Industry Forum set up by the DTI and the SMMT in order to try to increase the performance of the car component industry in Britain to world-class competitive levels. Whitehall officials believe that the Forum is the first example of close industrial partnership between government and business, which, like the Virtual University, could be extended to other sectors.

Mr Gibson urged the industry to improve its manufacturing processes in an effort to obtain the "real difference in productivity which is within all our grasps".

Michael Gifford is to stand down as chief executive of Rank

Teare faces pay cut in move to Rank

By Philip Pangalos

ANDREW TEARE, chief executive of English China Clays, will succeed Michael Gifford as chief executive of Rank Organisation, Britain's largest leisure group, from next spring when Mr Gifford will retire.

Mr Teare's move from the helm of English China to that of Rank will see him catapulted into a FT-SE 100 company capitalised at £3.55 billion, more than three times English China's present market capitalisation of £1.02 billion.

However, Mr Teare may see his total pay package, including bonuses and pension, reduced as a result of the move. Mr Teare is expected to be on a similar total annual remuneration package to that of Mr Gifford, who received a total of £488,000 in the year to October 31, 1994. However, this would represent a drop on his total package at ECC, which amounted to £616,816 in 1994.

Mr Gifford, who has been Rank's chief executive since 1983, told Rank's board last year that he intended to retire soon after his sixtieth birthday, which is next January. Under his contract, Mr Gifford can retire from next year on a full pension and also retains his existing options entitlements.

Mr Teare, understood to be on a six-month contract with ECC, will join Rank's board as a non-executive director from January, but is unlikely to move up to chief executive until after Rank's annual meeting in April.

Mr Gifford said: "Having served with Andrew on the board of ECC for over four years, it is clear that he is an experienced and talented chief executive and Rank is fortunate to get him."

Mr Teare, 53, is also currently a non-executive director of Prudential and NFC. He was appointed as ECC's chief executive in 1990, prior to which he spent six years as managing director of Rugby Group. He said: "I am very pleased to be taking over from Mike as chief executive of Rank. The company has established strong businesses in the leisure and entertainment field and I will be working with the management team to continue to develop Rank's leading position."

Lawrence Urquhart, ECC's chairman, said: "The board acknowledges with gratitude the contribution made by Andrew Teare in refocusing the group, in strengthening its finances, and in improving the performance of its operating divisions over the past six years." A successor will be announced before next spring. Rank shares rose 7p to 427p; ECC fell 16p to 334p.

Classic to appeal over £1,000 fine

By Robert Miller

CLASSIC BLOODSTOCK, the racing investment group that raised £3.2 million from 6,500 investors and is currently under investigation by the Department of Trade and Industry, is to appeal against the automatic £1,000 fine levied for the late filing of its first report and accounts. Companies House last night said that the accounts had still not been received although they were due on May 27.

The company, which yesterday held its long-delayed meeting attended by about 100 shareholders, said it would appeal on the grounds that Ron Dawson, founder and director of Classic, had been suffering from ill-health. Andrew Irish, of Stephenson Davies, Classic's auditor, said: "Hopefully Mr Dawson is now getting better and he is in daily contact from Spain where he is living."

Mr Irish added that the company still had £600,000 of the original cash raised but could not put a current value on the 23 horses owned by the group and bought for about £1.3 million. He confirmed that the DTI had written to Classic asking for an explanation of the late filing and asking that Mr Dawson's wife, Maureen Moorcroft, a director of the company, be replaced by "someone with more experience".

BUSINESS ROUNDUP

Leeson lawyer denies plea-bargain claim

NICK LEESON'S British lawyer, Stephen Pollard, of Kingsley Napley, last night dismissed claims that his client has plea bargained with the authorities in Singapore before his return to that country, expected around December 1. The German Government is expected to give final approval by the end of next week to the now voluntary extradition of Mr Leeson to Singapore, where he faces 11 charges of forgery and cheating. The German Justice Ministry has already approved the extradition and the Foreign Ministry will give the political go-ahead within ten days.

Mr Leeson, who is blamed for the £860 million collapse of Barings, is expected to plead guilty to some of the charges he faces, which carry a maximum sentence of 14 years. By agreeing to plead guilty, the 28-year-old trader might expect four to six years in prison. His Singapore lawyers, headed by John Koh, are not expected to plea bargain for lesser charges but to use the voluntary return in mitigation in the court case expected to start in February or March. They will also point out that he is willing to answer all questions put to him.

Watchdog reform urged

ALISTAIR DARLING, Labour's City spokesman, has called on the Government to scrap the City watchdog system, saying it was "an irrational, expensive and cumbersome structure that doesn't serve the public interest and is an increasing burden on the industry". He was speaking the day after the Commons Treasury Select Committee's report on financial services regulation called for the Treasury to assume control of all aspects of the sector and questioned whether the Bank of England should be allowed to continue supervising the banking system.

Homebuyers 'ahead'

BUYING a home is now cheaper than renting in every region of Britain, according to a survey by Abbey National. Becoming an owner-occupier, rather than a tenant, saves at least £20,000 over 25 years. The survey says that because of the uncertain state of the housing market, 40 per cent of households now rent from councils, housing associations and private landlords, against 30 per cent previously. In central London, the most expensive place to live, renting rather than buying a five-bedroom house can cost nearly £3 million more over the 25-year period.

Port action challenged

THE High Court judgment has been reserved until tomorrow in the challenge by A Poortman, a family-owned London food importer, to the Port of Felixstowe's restraint of £100,000 worth of the importer's split lentils to offset debts incurred by a failed shipping line which had carried the lentils. Mr Justice Clarke was yesterday asked by Poortman to decide whether Felixstowe is allowed to restrain the cargo. Felixstowe says its terms and conditions allow it to, even though Poortman has paid for the goods and freight charges.

Direct Line under fire

THE Advertising Standards Authority has upheld a complaint against Direct Line. Royal Bank of Scotland's phone insurance subsidiary, for misleading advertising for the third time. The complaint concerned a headline that read: "Every six seconds, somebody gets a better deal on their motor insurance". The ASA said it implied every policy sold was better value than the buyer's previous policy and that "had not been demonstrated to be true". It denied the insurer's claim that the complainant was a competitor. An appeal is planned.

British Coal sells Ulster fuel business

BRITISH COAL has completed the sale of Cawoods, its solid fuel distribution business in Northern Ireland, for an undisclosed sum to a management team lead by Leslie Murray. Cawoods' managing director (Ross Tieman writes).

The business, which has annual revenues of £73 million, includes the Heat subsidiary, which maintains domestic boilers. Discussions with management teams are continuing over the planned sale of the corporation's mainland fuels distribution businesses, British Fuel Distributors, British Fuels, and British Fuels (Oils).

☐ Sir Evelyn goes it alone ☐ Day of Welsh mega-utility draws nearer ☐ Lid on pay in the nervous Nineties

The price of independence

☐ INDEPENDENCE is the most important thing in the world to Sir Evelyn de Rothschild. But his determination to keep NM Rothschild as a family business borders on an arrogance not often seen in the City of London of the 1990s.

Sir Evelyn is a private figure, not often tempted to issue statements to the press. His decision, therefore, to make a curt but to-the-point statement that the Rothschild family remained committed to the independence of the bank demonstrates just how irritated he had become with constant speculation that it was a takeover target.

It is now common knowledge in the City that Lord Alexander, chairman of NatWest, made an approach to Sir Evelyn earlier this year. What he proposed was totally unacceptable, and the talks, such as they were, ended there and then. Neither side will confirm or deny that they took place and are very sensitive when pushed. Rothschild made its statement; NatWest remains silent and would prefer everybody simply to forget about it.

A link-up between Rothschild and NatWest makes good sense, as there are few investment banking businesses left in the City that would complement each other as well. Sir Evelyn got it right in 1986 when he bought a 25 per cent stake in Smith New Court for £4 million and the alliance worked well for both sides. Rothschild gained strong distribution for international equity issues where its corporate financiers were acting as advisers. But the relationship between the two cooled, the prospect of Rothschild acquiring SNC faded, and the bank made a profit of more than £100 million when SNC was taken over by Merrill Lynch in the summer.

Having rebuffed NatWest, Rothschild is left in an uncomfortable position. It is not as big, as strong or as profitable as Schroders. It is not big enough to play in the major league with the integrated European houses such as Deutsche Morgan Grenfell, Dresdner Bank-owned Kleinwort Benson and SBC Warburg or with the American investment banking titans. Neither would it happily lower its ambitions and accept the status of boutique merchant bank alongside Hambro Magan or Lazard Brothers.

It could bring additional outside capital in — Sun Alliance has a 20 per cent stake, Eagle Star has 5 per cent. But bringing in passive shareholders who would have no input in the business does not solve any of its problems.

The bank is busy now — with mandates to act as independent adviser on privatisations including Deutsche Telekom and ENI among others — but the newly integrated European houses are breathing down Rothschild's neck and in a strong position to win future business. Given Sir Evelyn's reluctance to live in the 1990s, it is hard to see the bank attracting the same quality of business or generating sufficiently high quality earnings three or four years down the line.

Applied Cymru

☐ THERE was always something fishy about Welsh Water's 1991 approach for South Wales Electricity. The two were depicted as poles apart, the possible merger a hostile affair that had been mounted by Jones the Water against fierce opposition from Jones the Power. But outside viewers, at least, thought that Welsh blood was stronger than, ahem, Welsh water and the two were a little closer than they professed to be.

Rumour has it that the South Wales board was split, with at least one prominent member quite keen on the alliance. Now it appears the Welsh card may again be played. Water clearly thinks it can steal a march on any of the other possible bidders, including the various US utilities who must be becoming increasingly nervous that the supply of regional electricity companies or Recs will dry up.

This is because the sale of any utility on the Celtic fringe, vide the fumbled attempts to privatise Scottish water must be fraught with political risk. But the marriage of two Welsh companies, by contrast, can be pictured as a marriage of mutual support, as Cymru against all comers.

In 1991, the merger of a water and power company to create a mighty regional utility was an idea whose time had not yet come, for which investors in Swalec will be eternally thankful because the price then would have left plenty of change from five quid. We are now talking double that and then some, and Water's tentative offer of £10.20, in a statement forced on them by the Takeover Panel and remarkable in its vagueness, looks like wishful thinking.

The idea has come around now, of course, thanks to the Government's decision to allow the creation of United Utilities out of North West Water and Norweb.

There are now, count them, three green bottles left hanging on the wall in the electricity showroom, disregarding Northern which has already survived a bid, and two of them have overlapping water companies on their territory. Thames has already ruled itself out of any bid for London Electricity, but the Yorkshire tykes, another close-knit regional mafia, bear close watching.

Ask for a pay rise? No fear!

☐ THE Bank of England professes itself puzzled by the failure of wages to pick up during an economic recovery. Why, the mandarins muse, are employees not knocking on bosses' doors for more money, in spite of unemployment figures, which in September reached the level last seen in the middle of 1988?

Even more strange, the Bank opines, is the fact that settlements have not risen in spite of the squeeze on incomes by higher taxes, which would normally spur employees to demand higher pay to compensate. The Bank concludes that either real wages are about to start rising — fat chance — or that unemployment remains significantly above its natural rate, whatever that may be.

Well, listen up. The Bank's judgment relies on old economic norms that no longer apply in the nervous Nineties, and it rests on a dubious belief that there is a definable natural level of unemployment. Ask anybody working in the real world why earnings have not risen during this recovery as in past ones and they will come up with a much more sensible answer, which is blind terror.

The industrial reforms of the 1980s have rendered the labour market permanently less secure for large swathes of the workforce. Many more people work part-time and on temporary contracts, and use of casual labour is widespread.

The jobs market is stacked dramatically in favour of the employer rather than the worker. Look no further than fear of unemployment for a reason for low earnings growth.

Whipped into line

☐ LORD WAKEHAM, in his new role as chairman of Vosper Thornycroft, has warned the Government that if a vital frigate order does not go to his company, as many as 500 of his workers may lose their jobs. Can this be the same Lord Wakeham, as redoubtable Chief Whip, who would surely have been the first to counsel the Government against giving in to such public sector pressure?

Manweb job cuts add £30m to cost of purchase

By Christine Buckley

SCOTTISHPOWER has inherited a bill of about £30 million after Manweb, the regional electricity company it recently acquired, cut about 25 per cent of its staff in the first half of the year.

The job cuts, part of Manweb's scorched earth defence against the Scottish generator's hostile £1.1 billion bid, have only been discovered by the bidder in the past three weeks after its management staff moved in. Ian Russell, finance director, said: "We had heard rumours that there had been job reductions, but the amount is a great surprise and our concern is that the right selections have been made for the people that should go."

The move is likely to make the task of delivering cost savings from the amalgamation of the two businesses more difficult. The generator has said it will look to eek out savings initially from the headquarters of Manweb which will not now need as large a presence. Duplication of information technology between the two groups is another area highlighted for cuts.

Yesterday, Ian Robinson, chief executive, would not rule out future partnerships, such as a link with the facilities management operation of United Utilities, the fusion of North West Water and Norweb, the electricity company. The facilities management division will handle joint functions, such as billing and meter reading, and its location in the northwest of England will be complementary to Manweb's customer base.

ScottishPower, which paid £38.5 million in administrative costs and underwriting fees for its bid for Manweb, is reluctant to reveal further how the integration is progressing. The costs, which it plans to outline early next year, will be substantial.

The gearing of the generator, which pulled out of a potential bid for an Australian electricity company when it launched its offensive on Manweb, is expected to jump to 75 per cent when the impact of Manweb is felt next year. At the end of September, the debt ratio was 9.7 per cent. But ScottishPower has said the acquisition will be earnings enhancing in 1996-97.

ScottishPower, which is keen to strengthen its structure as a multi-utility with significant operations in gas and telecoms, pushed up its sales in the six months to September 30 by 6 per cent to £777 million, while profit before tax climbed a modest 3.9 per cent to £128 million.

The interim dividend, payable on March 8, was lifted 13.6 per cent to 5.17p, with the company promising a similar rise for the full dividend to take the total to 15.5p.

News Corp operating profits rise

THE News Corporation, parent company of The Times, yesterday reported a rise in operating profit after income tax and abnormal items to $227 million ($224 million) for the three months to September 30.

Before abnormal items first-quarter operating profit slipped to $210 million from $222 million, in spite of a rise in revenues from $2,203 million to $2,310 million.

Strong growth in the US television business and at British newspapers was offset by higher costs at Star TV and lower earnings in the filmed entertainment business because of the absence of significant syndication earnings achieved in the previous year. Rising paper prices affected all of the company's publishing businesses.

In the UK, newspaper results exceeded last year by more than 20 per cent because of the continued growth of advertising and increased circulation revenues. Each of the company's five titles posted gains in advertising revenues, with the largest gains coming from The Times and News of the World. Cover price increases at The Sun and The Times have had little to no effect on circulation. The Times circulation has grown to more than 680,000.

Vosper jobs warning on Navy tender

By Ross Tieman
Industrial Correspondent

VOSPER THORNYCROFT, the Southampton shipbuilder, drove home its case for a £400 million contract to build three Type-23 frigates for the Royal Navy with a warning that 500 jobs might be lost if the work went to Yarrow Shipbuilders, its rival on Clydeside.

Lord Wakeham, the chairman, said that in spite of a solid order book for navies overseas, Vosper would be unable to maintain its 1,400-strong shipyard workforce without the Ministry of Defence contract. A decision on which of Britain's two remaining warship builders will be granted the contract is expected before Christmas.

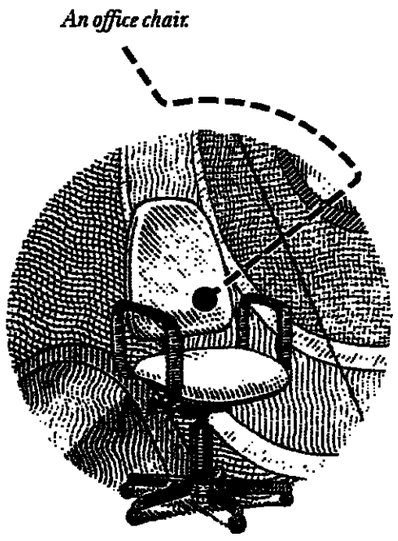

Martin Jay, Vosper's managing director, said that the company had bid to build one, two, or three ships.

A steady building rate on smaller ships helped to keep the company on track during the half year to September 30.

On sales down £14 million to £114 million, pre-tax profits rose 11 per cent to £11.4 million. A third of that was generated by interest on the company's £109 million cash pile. The interim dividend is 6.8p, up 0.7p, payable on January 17.

Investors reluctant to sell or commit fresh funds

ANOTHER burst of bid activity among the utilities and a firm start on Wall Street, enabled share prices in London to close at their best of the day.

The FT-SE 100 index, which had traded in narrow limits for much of the session, eventually closed 14.7 points up at 3,537.1, cheered by an opening rise of more than 31 points in the Dow Jones industrial average.

But trading conditions remained thin, with institutional investors reluctant to sell, but unwilling to commit fresh funds. By the close of business, a total of 665 million shares had changed hands.

The news that Welsh Water was considering making a bid for South Wales Electricity provided the main talking point, sending the latter's shares soaring 70p to £10.58. Welsh Water admitted it had been prompted into making a statement by the Takeover Panel and said any such offer would be pitched about the £10.20 mark, valuing the entire company at £1.59 billion.

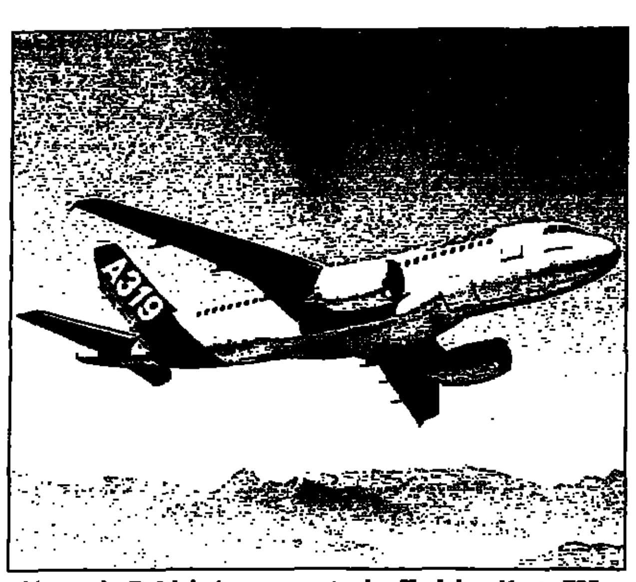

But it emphasised that no final decision had been made. Welsh Water, down 29p at 725p, would become the second water utility to bid for a regional electricity company. Norweb, up 3p at £11.93, recently agreed terms from North West Water, 3p better at 584p.

There are now just three regional electricity companies that have not received a bid. They are London, up 24p at 946p, Yorkshire, 30p up at 954p, and East Midlands, 25p better at 948p.

Northumbrian Water, which could soon find itself on the receiving end of a bid from Lyonnaise des Eaux, jumped a further 19p to £10.93.

Shareholders at ScottishPower were rewarded with a 14 per cent increase in the interim dividend and the shares responded with a jump of 6p to 361p. The group, which recently acquired Manweb for £1 billion, says that the rate of growth will be maintained in the second half, raising the total to 15.5p. Pre-tax profits in the first six months grew by £5 million to £128 million.

British Aerospace made the most of claims that its commercial aircraft arm is about to return to profit, with the shares rising 11p to 725p. Brokers are saying that it could be back in the black by next year, at least a a year ahead of schedule.

Shares in British Aerospace took off, rising 11p to 725p

Henderson Crosthwaite, the broker, has been a big buyer of BAe this week after taking a close look at its investment in Orange, the mobile telephone network jointly owned with Hutchison Whampoa.

Henderson says the number of subscribers is set to increase to 400,000 by Christmas, doubling to 800,000 within the next year. The network should cover at least 90 per cent of Britain by March. BAe's investment is thought to be worth £500 million, or £1 a share, ahead of the flotation of Orange sometime in 1997.

Glaxo Wellcome says it will triple research and development productivity by the turn of the century. It has set itself a target of bringing three new treatments to market each year after creating a new R&D division following this year's merger with Wellcome, which resulted in 1,800 jobs being shed from a total workforce of 11,500. The shares fell 12p to 875p.

Third-quarter figures from BAT Industries stood out in an otherwise subdued market place. Shares of the tobacco and financial services group climbed 14p to 547p after it reported an increase in pre-tax profits from £1.49 billion to £1.8 billion. The main thrust to profits came from a 34 per cent rise in profits at its tobacco division. Volumes grew 20 per cent, with strong demand for international brands. The group has also started to reap the benefits of its American Tobacco acquisition. Profits from financial services, which includes Eagle Star and Farmers Inc, also grew 19 per cent. Profit estimates for the full year range from £2.4 billion to £2.6 billion.

Lehman Brothers, the US securities house, was a buyer of BAT yesterday, claiming the shares represent good value for money up to the 600p level.

A profits warning left Thorntons, the confectioner, 7p down at 136p. The group told shareholders at the annual meeting that the hot summer and autumn had affected sales and would result in profits dropping below last year's level.

Rank Organisation enjoyed a rise of 7p to 427p after learning that Andrew Teare is to succeed Michael Gifford as chief executive. He is currently chief executive of English China Clays, 5p better at 355p.

Eurocopy, the office equipment group, fell 6p to 77p after announcing that bids talks had been terminated. The company began negotiations in August.Cyril Gay, chairman, said Eurocopy would now embark on an expansion programme and had strengthened the management to achieve that.

Electrocomponents failed to benefit from an 18 per cent increase in pre-tax profits during the session, with the shares falling 3p to 325p. Pre-tax profits of £41.9 million came in at the top end of expectations.

☐ GILT-EDGED: Gilts received an early boost from firmer overseas bond markets. The Bank of England quarterly Inflation Report was favourably received in spite of its continuing doubts about the Government's ability to hit its inflation target. News of a further softening of European interest rates also boosted sentiment.

In the futures pit, the December series of the Long Gilt climbed £$^{21}/_{32}$ to end the session at £108$^{1}/_{32}$ as the number of contracts completed grew to 50,000.

Among convetional issues, benchmark Treasury 8 per cent 2013 rose £$^{7}/_{8}$ to £100$^{9}/_{32}$, while at the shorter end, Treasury 8 per cent 2000 was £$^{11}/_{32}$ dearer at £109$^{9}/_{32}$.

☐ NEW YORK: A bounce in technology issues pushed Wall Street shares higher in early trading. At midday, the Dow Jones industrial average was up 27.46 points to 4,824.49.

Arjo Wiggins fell 17p to 211p in the wake of disappointing third-quarter trading news from KNP, its Dutch rival. The figures came in below expectations and revealed the effects of destocking by customers. Earlier this week, Merrill Lynch, the US securities house, told clients that Arjo shares were a sell.

TEMPUS

Tobacco road

ANTI-SMOKERS must find the quarterly reports from BAT a deeply depressing read. The company sold some 500 billion cigarettes, a 20 per cent rise on the previous year, and the profit generated from supplying nicotine addicts was up by a third. They should not be too disheartened as about 24 billion of the extra sticks came from the acquisition of American Tobacco, while the big increases from the new markets in Eastern Europe are achieved by converting existing smokers to a free market brand.

Cynics will jeer, but BAT's strategy is not based on increasing the number of smokers. In the long term, such a strategy is doomed to failure. The company has watched its most developed market, the US, decline year on year, an experience being replicated in Europe and which will be repeated elsewhere as consumers in the developing world becomes more affluent and health-conscious. BAT is making more money from tobacco because it is in decline. Before East Europeans fling their fags in the bin and join healthclubs, BAT reckons they will spend their money on the icons of the nouveau riche, namely American cigarettes.

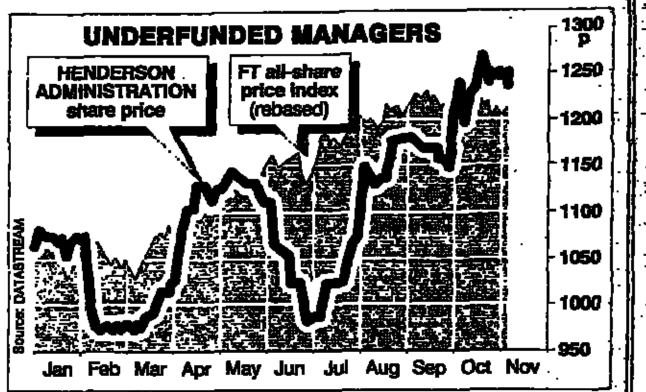

The strategy is working and while BAT's financial services companies struggle to generate new business in the UK, tobacco is ensuring that profits and dividends continue their steady growth. BAT should continue to produce dividend growth of 8-9 per cent but the market still fails to reward it for consistent performance. But there are few companies trading on prospective yields of 6 per cent which can generate such growth in a mature business.

Henderson

HENDERSON Administration's new managing director has a big ambition — he wants to restore the company as one of Britain's top six fund managers. With the loss of further pension fund clients again in the first half of this year, he has his work cut out.

Dugald Eadie is untested and he needs to prove that he can both retain clients and recruit new ones by the spring. With nine years before his retirement, he aims to leave Henderson in a pre-eminent position when he goes. At their peak in the early 1980s, Henderson's pension funds under management were approaching £6 billion — before the more recent peaks in the stock market. They have since dwindled to £2.96 billion and will fall further this year as clients representing £300 million have given notice of their intention to quit.

Henderson shares are trading on a prospective multiple of 20 times, reflecting takeover speculation. Its strengths lie in a small but growing joint venture in the US and strong retail businesses in the UK, which should benefit from any pick up in the retail sector. Henderson values its independence, at least until it sorts out its problems, but it has obvious attractions for a retail bank, such as NatWest, which would provide distribution for retail products. Nine years is a long time in the stock market and Mr Eadie might retire a little earlier.

ScottishPower

LIKE a spoilt child at Christmas, ScottishPower is grumbling that its new toy is not as exciting as it had hoped. The Scots paid £1.1 billion for the northwest regional electricity company. After spending a further £38.5 million in bid and underwriting costs, the generator was keen to take its toy out of the wrapping and shake it up and down.

Imagine ScottishPower's disappointment when the new toy turned out to be smaller than expected. Poor little Manweb, in a frantic effort to defend itself from the Scottish bully, adopted a scorched earth defence and stripped out 850 jobs during the course of the bid. All told, some 25 per cent of its staff were axed in the first half.

This leaves the new management of Manweb, which has recently decamped to Cheshire, with a bit of a headache. With no one left to sack, how can they deliver the cost reductions which shareholders will clamour for? True, headcount savings have been made ahead of schedule but the pressure will still be on ScottishPower to produce more.

The costs of integrating Manweb have yet to be calculated but they will not be cheap. Much will depend on how quickly ScottishPower can generate savings, but in the short term it may have to fall back on the real business of making more money from retailing. Profits there have recently doubled but in this market, selling white goods is more difficult than issuing P45s.

Ex-Lands

EX-LANDS is the second property group within a month to decide to split itself in two by floating its leisure business. The rationale in both the Ex-Lands and Burford cases is simple: real estate investment companies are valued in relation to their asset values while leisure is a business that trades and should properly be valued on forecasts of growth in earnings. A decision to invest in Clubhaus, the Ex-Lands spin-off, depends on your view of the profit potential of golf courses.

The UK has been oversupplied with golf courses but Clubhaus is undeterred and reckons it can pick up distressed businesses cheaply and make money. Clubhaus is shunning the Wentworth market in favour of families and reckons its latest £2.5 million purchase will be generating profits of £600,000 within a couple of years.

If the outlook is so favourable investors may wonder why the banks are insisting that Ex-lands continue to guarantee the Clubhaus borrowings after the demerger. Could it be that they are not so confident that the clubs will generate cash? Such guarantees make a curious debut for a listed company.

AFTER being accused of losing more than $1 billion of Daiwa Bank's money, Toshihide Iguchi, the dealer charged with fraud in the US, is so penniless he can't even post bail. Instead, he has been put under house arrest with an electronic tag attached to his ankle. His property has been confiscated by the US authorities, and he faces up to 90 years in jail. Clearly what he needs now is a lucrative book deal such as Nick Leeson's.

Bulldog ails

PET PLAN, the UK's largest insurer of dogs, cats and horses, has been swapping market intelligence with international colleagues at the world's first pet insurance conference. The consensus is that of the insurance risks, the bulldog is the most sickly. "They are four times more likely to die as puppies than all other breeds combined, and if do survive infancy they are twice as likely to suffer illness than all other breeds", a friend from the kennels growls. No wonder an extra 9 per cent is loaded on to any policy covering a bulldog.

On the prowl

THE broking war is hotting up. Williams de Broe yesterday snapped up James Capel's entire eight-person institutional sales and research team in Birmingham, and took the one person manning Capel's Leeds office. "There is nobody left here working for James Capel," a voice at the end of the phone said.

Special delivery

SIR Terence Conran and other City celebrities enjoyed a luncheon with a difference yesterday. Veuve Clicquot, the champagne house, delivered to their desks a bottle of Veuve Clicquot Ponsardin Rich Reserve 1988, and plates of marinated eel and octopus, followed by eminçé of Barbary duck with cinnamon, mango and apple chutney. The champagne, which retails at £28 a bottle, has been specially developed to partner food, especially spiced meals. "It should be served from a decanter, and it's good with fish 'n chips", a Widow devotee said.

Silver lining

THOSE who keep a daily diary at SBC Warburg will be recording this week's staff shuffles with silver ball point pens. "Wednesday, November 8. Sir David Scholey, chairman, goes. Marcel Ospel, chief executive, the man who introduced us to dress-down days in London, to move to Basle," a typical entry might read.

The silver pens come to hand because Ospel recently sent out a two-page letter to senior staff outlining how he saw the "new future" that lay ahead for the merged group and enclosed a "silver" ball point. Ospel's letter urged recipients to use their new "silver" ball point to write the next, exciting chapter of the history that will take the group into the next century. Some of the troops were delighted with their gift. Others were aghast. The pens were last reported trading at £2 bid, £8 offered.

Rate cut on the Christmas cards

Quibbling over the Bank of England's inflation reports masks the real economic issues

The chart on the right could determine whether you keep your job and how much you pay for your mortgage. To be more precise, your life will be ruled by the dotted line in the bottom right hand corner of the upper chart. If the line ends within 3 millimeters of the "2" shown on the vertical axis, you will do well: your job should be secure, interest rates will fall and the present slowdown in the British economy will almost certainly be followed by an acceleration in 1996.

If, however, there are more than 4 millimeters of space between the dotted line and the "2" on the axis, beware. It may be prudent to take early retirement or voluntary redundancy while you still have the chance.

For all the fuss about the forthcoming Budget, there is very little prospect that Kenneth Clarke will alter the overall balance of fiscal policy in a significant way. As a result, the prospects for economic growth next year will be largely determined by the level of interest rates. And when it comes to the conduct of monetary policy, the Bank of England's seems to be influenced largely by a glorified (and computerised) version of the measuring ritual I have just described.

That, at least, was the message from the Bank's quarterly Inflation Report, published yesterday. Under the bizarre monetary policy framework introduced by John Major and Norman Lamont in the heat of their panic immediately after White Wednesday, the Bank now has only one monetary objective: to try to guess what level of short-term interest rates will cause inflation in about two years' time to hit whatever arbitrary numerical target happens to have been announced by the Chancellor.

At present that target is set at "2.5 per cent or less". But the Bank refuses to publish its actual forecasts of inflation in any other form than the quarterly chart reproduced above — and that chart significantly does not have a line showing the 2.5 per cent target. So economic commentators, businessmen and investors are reduced every three months to taking out their rulers and calculators to work out exactly how many millimeters above or below the magic number the Bank's inflation projections may lie.

In the past I thought this ritual so ridiculous that it never occurred to me to mention it. But yesterday I suddenly realised that it was extremely important and instructive. What opened my eyes was the press conference held as usual by Mervyn King, the Bank's economics director, to introduce the Inflation Report. This press conference, which has become one of the most important events on the quarterly economic calendar since the forthright Mr King took over at the Bank, left me aghast.

There was one hour, as usual, to discuss the fragile and uncertain state of the British economy, on the turbulence in the currency markets and on the many confusing developments in such key export markets as America, Japan and Europe.

Out of the 60 minutes available to seek the Bank's views on these and many other interesting subjects, no less than 45 minutes were devoted to two questions. What exactly did the Inflation Report mean by saying that, without any change in interest rates, inflation was likely to remain "just above" 2.5 per cent? And if the Bank's inflation forecast was just above 2.5 per cent, did this not mean that interest rates had to rise?

Mr King's answer was to repeat a now-familiar mantra. First, the Bank's comments referred only to its "central projection" of where inflation would be in two years' time.

Secondly, what mattered for policymaking was the distribution of possible outcomes around this central projection (which, according to Nr King is now "evenly distributed" and not skewed towards higher inflation as it was earlier in the year).

Thirdly, Mr King kept insisting, policymaking and economic forecasting are not just mechanical processes. The Bank does not simply feed figures into a computer and accept as gospel whatever inflation projection the machines spews out. And it certainly does not recommend a change in interest rates every time its central inflation forecast is marginally above or below 2.5 per cent; if it did, official interest rates would be moving up or down every day.

All these were perfectly reasonable arguments in favour of the present official policy: to leave interest rates where they are, at least until after the Budget. But none of Mr King's objections could still the clamour from the press corps (and later from the City analysts) for the Bank to "come clean" and say what it "really" thinks. How far above 2.5 per cent is "just above"? Will the Bank soon demand another increase in interest rates because of these projections? And if not, will it simply let the Government miss its inflation target?

Amid this clamour, there was only one journalist — our own Janet Bush — who bothered to ask the obvious and infinitely more important question. Why on earth should anyone care whether inflation in two years' time is 2.5 per cent, 2.6 per cent, or even 2.7 per cent (heaven forbid)? A related question could have been added. Why should the Bank or anyone else pay the slightest attention to a tiny overshoot in long-term inflation projections — an overshoot which is based on the implausibly pessimistic assumption that sterling will continue to depreciate throughout the next two years and is anyway, by Mr King's own admission, far smaller than the margins of error in the very fallible economic models which spew them out?

The answer, of course, is that all the jesuitical quibbling about the Bank's quarterly inflation projections simply diverts attention from the real issues in British monetary policy:

First, the monetary framework cobbled together by the panicking Norman Lamont in the days after White Wednesday has imposed on the Bank an automatic bias in favour of higher interest rates, regardless of their effects on the real economy.

Secondly, the quasi-autonomy granted to the Bank has made it much harder for the Chancellor to balance changes in fiscal and monetary policy — and therefore to rein in public borrowing and spending.

Thirdly, that the Bank's misjudged demands for higher interest rates since the start of this year have undermined confidence in British monetary policy. This is evidenced by the gap between British and international bond yields, which has shot up since January, by 1.1 percentage points and is now wider than it was a month before White Wednesday.

Finally, and most importantly, the present enfeebled state of the British economy fully justifies a move to sharply lower interest rates. While GDP is still growing, albeit at a feeble 2 per cent, an alarmingly large proportion of this growth has been going into unsold stocks. Final demand came to a virtual standstill in the second quarter (as illustrated by the dark bars in the bottom chart) and has probably become even weaker since. To make matters worse, the weakness of final demand is a worldwide phenomenon. This is why every other country in the G7 apart from Britain is now clearly set on a course of monetary easing.

In sum, the case for a cut in interest rates in December or January is becoming overwhelming. The only proviso is that Mr Clarke must maintain a tight grip on fiscal policy in the Budget. Of course, the Bank could still decide to oppose a rate cut even after a prudent Budget. But if a post-Budget rate cut triggers another row between the Chancellor and the Bank this should be put down to personal chemistry or Eddie George's political calculations, rather than anything in yesterday's Inflation Report.

Despite all this reassurance, some readers may still share the City's neurosis about the Bank's quarterly inflation report. So let me now answer the question that must have been plaguing them ever since the first paragraph: is the distance between the dotted line less than 3mm (indicating a satisfactory 2.5 per cent inflation) or greater than 4mm (suggesting a dangerous 2.67 per cent)? As far as I can see, the true gap is about half-way between these two extremes. So take your choice — sleep easily or quake with fear of 2.67 per cent inflation.

We economists always try to avoid giving a straight answer.

Business chief leads CBI down path of strict political neutrality

Philip Bassett finds an organisation all set to monitor the election battleground

Business leaders are to have the chance to judge directly for themselves between the approach to business being pursued by the two major political parties in advance of the forthcoming general election.

At the CBI annual conference, which opens in Birmingham at the weekend, Tony Blair will speak on Labour's proposals on the economy, on business and on investment. Four hours later, standing on the same spot, Michael Heseltine will set out the Government's case on precisely the same issues.

"We can't evade the fact," says Adair Turner, the CBI leader, "that the alternative policies being put forward by Conservatives and Labour are a major issue for business."

CBI conferences have for years attracted the big political as well as business guns, but the direct political clash this year, in what could be the last CBI conference before a general election, is stark. "I don't have any awkwardness about it," says Mr Turner. "I think it makes absolute sense. We should see alternative points of view put forward."

Traditionally, business has always supported the Conservatives. But since Mr Blair's election to the party leadership, Labour has been adopting much more business-friendly policies, and the prospect of Labour forming the next government is prompting business to draw closer to the party than it has needed to for many years.

Much of the election battleground will be fought on territory central to the interests of business — especially the performance of the UK economy and Britain's overall international economic competitiveness. Blood has already been drawn with Labour's recent use of OECD figures to illustrate its claims of the UK's declining world economic performance. CBI leaders believe that in the run-up to the election, political clashing over such issues will accelerate, and to ensure that the business case is heard, the CBI must remain politically neutral.

Mr Turner says: "I can see no alternative for us but to be as fact-based and as straightforward as possible." He believes that over the past few years, the CBI has been able to comment on such issues as competitiveness, both supportively and critically, without its views being seen as backing either the Conservatives or Labour — but that the sharpness of the political battle now means such a stance will be more difficult. So strict political neutrality, rather than "natural" support for the Conservatives, will now be required: "Otherwise, we end up either mute, or overtly political — and I don't think we should be either."

Business, he says, will judge the proposals of the political parties against what business wants. Next week's conference will be a part of that. "We have been seen in the past as anti-Labour," he acknowledges, "because the response that came forward from the Labour Party to our statements of what business required was clearly out of line with what we said. If that response is now different, it makes it easier for us."

Mr Turner even takes his ideas about business neutrality so far as to envisage Labour leaders in government coming to future CBI conferences: "If it is the case that we get a Labour government, we would expect not just to have government ministers there, but at that stage Conservative opposition speakers."

Allied in some ways to these issues are two new initiatives from the CBI. In the first, it will examine the vexed area of economic short-termism in Britain, looking in particular at the financing of industry and its relationship with the City. In the second, it is to look at how to breathe new life into the Government's Private Finance Inititaive, which business largely judges to be flagging. While Kenneth Clarke is expected to try to provide fresh impetus to the PFI in this month's Budget, the CBI wants to try to re-stimulate business' involvement with the idea. Both studies are expected to report in about four months' time. Both are politically sensitive, and have potential for being seen as critical of the Government — and both will be key test cases of the CBI's new political neutrality.

Adair: new initiatives

But if the delicate question of handling party politics in the run-up to the election is important to the CBI, it is far from the only issue with which the confederation is grappling. Though he is largely satisfied with the CBI as bequeathed to him by his predecessor, Howard Davies, Mr Turner does envisage some change. He would like the CBI conference itself to feature more debate, and next week's event will see signs of that. He would like the CBI's monthly council meeting, which some see as a cumbersome rubberstamping operation, to be more dynamic. And he believes the process of policymaking could be speedier. He was concerned that the CBI put in place its strategy for this month's Budget as far back as July. In the longer term, he would also like to see greater coherence among Britain's disparate range of employer bodies.

The Budget itself is of particular concern. He is sceptical about suggested ideas of an across the board reduction in spending to fund tax cuts: "The danger of 5 per cent cuts across the board is that they are not terribly effective. They are not terribly effective in business, and they are not terribly effective in the business of government either. They are usually a cop-out from top management."

He recognises what he calls the "conflict of demands pulling on the Chancellor" between the political and economic imperatives, which will play out most obviously in the scale of tax cuts the Chancellor will bring forward. "We are worried about a going for a very high level of tax cuts which does not seem to fit the macroeconomic situation and would almost certainly involve risks with borrowing. And we would be very worried by cuts or failure to ensure the education and training budget."

CBI officials and insiders are already impressed by Mr Turner. So too are the ministers and Whitehall officials with whom he is already well-embarked on a series of talks. His policy of studied political neutrality may well raise the hackles of CBI backwoodsmen, but many are likely to agree with his judgment of it as the best way forward for the CBI at a sensitive political moment for business.

BUSINESS LETTERS

Finance sector faces change

From Mr Terry Foulkes

Sir, The letter from Paul Brown (November 2) addresses some of the putative advantages of the merger between TSB and Lloyds Bank. There are, however, other issues.

With the exception of the recent mortgage rate reductions and the fall in life industry business, the finance sector has not yet seen the effects of consumer power. Therefore, it has very little idea of the demands approaching it and in the meantime seems intent on scoring own goals.

After the estate agency debacle, espoused to facilitate cross-selling that did not materialise, the building societies have moved almost en bloc into the purchase of life companies at a time of declining business, and presumably for the same reasons. Now, the mass movement is towards being part of a financial supermarket in industries where there is already overprovision.

In the case of Lloyds Bank, they are undergoing one merger and have proposed another. That means three sets of staff, three cultures and three lots of operating systems to be re-engineered, downsized, empowered and all the other current fashions. All this in a world where cost is currently king and technology ever-demanding. Naturally, each company expects that market forces will not affect it and only the others will fail.

Which brings me to the customer. Some big businesses have moved to disintermediate finance providers. Small and medium-sized enterprises are not so fortunate yet. The personal customer is coming to terms with financial insecurity and portfolio employment/earnings. If obtaining income is difficult, careful management of finances will be vital. People might begin not only to mistrust financial service companies, but also to question whether to do business with them. It would be ironic if, at a time when the industry is busy bundling itself into 1960s-style groups for corporate growth or economies of scale, its most compliant set of customers start to unbundle the products and services on offer into personal pick and mix portfolios.

Yours faithfully,
TERRY FOULKES,
TAff Associates,

Cheadle Hulme,

'Fear' of bank success

From Mr John Barron

Sir, With regard to plans for seven-day banking by NatWest, you report ("Seven-day banking runs foul of union", November 2) that the Banking, Insurance and Finance Union "fears other branches will open for seven days if the Thurrock scheme is a success". How typical, but unsurprising, that a trade union should "fear" something that might be a "success".

Yours faithfully,
JOHN BARRON,

Half-time surge for parts firm

By Philip Pangalos

STRONG organic growth in Britain and a continued push overseas helped Electrocomponents, the UK's leading distributor of electronic, electrical and mechanical components, to an 18 per cent surge in first-half profits.

An expanding product range, bolstered by new product innovations and a widening geographical coverage, saw pre-tax profits advance to £41.9 million in the six months to September 30, on sales ahead 19 per cent to £257.3 million. Sales from RS Components, the group's main domestic subsidiary, grew 16 per cent, while sales at RS International expanded by 33 per cent.

The diverse range of products distributed by Electrocomponents, from a 17p pack of resistors to a £3,000 reel of cable, has grown from 52,300 in March to 59,400 line items now in the UK alone. Gross margins have held up and the average order value has remained at £80-£90, but the frequency of orders continues to increase, and UK customers grew to about 170,000.

Bob Lawson, chief executive, said the group had seen a good response since last year's introduction of a CD-Rom catalogue, with almost 200,000 disks issued, as well as versions on floppy disk and the Internet.

Mr Lawson is optimistic on prospects and expects continuing growth in the second half as the benefits of past investment pay off.

The interim dividend, which is payable on January 22, is raised 23 per cent to 2p (1.625p), partly reflecting an attempt to achieve more balance between the interim and final payouts. Earnings per share increased 18 per cent to 6.6p (5.6p).

Outflow of clients takes toll at Henderson

By Patricia Tehan, Banking Correspondent

HENDERSON Administration has been unable to stop the flow of clients from its pension fund business. The result was a 12.5 per cent fall in pre-tax profits to £9.8 million in the first half to September 30.

Institutional funds under management fell 37 per cent to £2.95 billion compared with the same period last year. The fall in the value of funds since the end of the last financial year is 20 per cent.

Another seven clients, representing £300 million of funds, have given notice since the end of September that they are taking their money elsewhere.

Dugald Eadie, who became managing director this year, said he believed that Henderson had been through the worst and was now in a position to begin actively seeking new business. He said this process would be helped by recent improvements in investment performance.

The value of total funds under management fell from £12 billion to £11.5 billion. However, it has grown since the end of March, when funds under management were £11 billion. Total funds under management and administration are increased from £12.87 billion at the end of March to £13.6 billion.

In a statement to shareholders, Ben Wrey, the chairman, said: "The test for your board lies in managing the rapidly changing mix of our activities and revenue sources."

Given Henderson's troubles — and the fact that Gartmore and Govett, a rival fund manager, has been put up for sale by its parents — it has been seen as a takeover target.

Mr Eadie said that he had not had approaches from potential purchasers and had not sought any. He added: "We are too busy managing the business."

Of the pre-tax profits, £1 million came from the sale of Henderson's venture capital business. Nevertheless, the first-half profit is an improvement on the £6.9 million reported in the second half of the last financial year.

Mr Wrey said that reflected not only favourable markets and control of cost but also the changing mix of Henderson's businesses. He echoed comments made on Tuesday by Hugh Stevenson, chairman of Mercury Asset Management, saying that in spite of buoyant world markets this year, it had not been enough "to enthuse the retail investor in the UK, where activity levels remain dull".

Investment trust funds under management rose from £3.6 billion at the end of March to £4 billion, and unit trusts were up from £1.3 billion to £1.4 billion. Peps were up from £422 million to £479 million and funds in the portfolio management service rose from £92 million to £107 million.

Henderson did well in its international investment business. Funds under management by Seligman Henderson, its American joint venture, doubled to £1.29 billion in the six months. International funds were up from £1.4 billion at the end of March to £1.99 billion.

The interim dividend has been held at 13.5p, payable on January 9.

Sir Richard Sykes said that reorganisation of the merged group would cut jobs to 9,700 from 11,500 by the year end

Glaxo to spend £1.2bn on R&D

By Martin Barrow

GLAXO Wellcome, the UK pharmaceuticals company, proposes to spend £1.2 billion on research and development in 1996.

The company, formed through last year's union of Glaxo and Wellcome, also outlined plans to achieve a three-fold increase in R&D productivity and to bring three new medicines to market each year by the year 2000.

Sir Richard Sykes, chief executive, told analysts and investors yesterday that the integration of the Wellcome group had led to a review of the portfolio, which now comprised 50 major research projects and 93 development projects. He was speaking at the company's new £700 million medicines research centre at Stevenage, in Hertfordshire.

Top research areas included neurosciences, anti-virals, cardiovascular disease and cancer, while development resources were tilted to respiratory systems, anti-viral infection, the central nervous system, oncology and cardiovascular care.

Sir Richard also noted that the reorganisation of the merged group was cutting worldwide staff to 9,700 by the end of the year from 11,500.

The group said it expects to file 39 regulatory submissions between now and the end of the year, including Troglitazone, an anti-diabetic treatment licensed in Europe for which early data showed less troublesome side effects than other therapies. Another submission covered the migraine treatment Naratriptan. Filings planned beyond 1996 included the hepatitis B treatment Lamivudine and a Neuraminidase influenza inhibitor.

Dr James Niedel, Glaxo Wellcome's executive director, research and development, said: "We saw the integration as an opportunity to change fundamentally the R&D organisation process."

Ex-Lands to float its golf activities

Robert and Graham Bourne, the property developer brothers are splitting into two by demerging Ex-Lands into separate property and leisure companies. The brothers, who made a fortune in the late 1980s when they sold Local London for £111 million, are seeking a separate listing for Ex-Landsgolf club operations, to be floated as Clubhaus.

Investors in Ex-Lands will each receive one new share in Ex-Lands Properties and one in Clubhaus, which, on its listing, will launch a placing and open offer to raise £5 million to buy more golf courses in the UK.

Robert Bourne said that he would become chief executive of Clubhaus, and his brother would run Ex-Lands. "My brother is the property expert," he explained.

"The problem we have is one of double identity. We have a UK property business rated at a discount to asset value and a leisure business which should be more properly rated on its earnings."

The Ex-Lands company will own properties worth £53 million. Pro forma net assets will be £29.8 million after demerger, with gearing 58 per cent.

Ex-Lands made profits of £1.5 million for the year to June 30, up from £1.3 million. Year-end net asset value was 27.6p, or 38.3p including revaluations of the golf clubs. The dividend is 0.5p (0.42p). Tempus, page 28

Eurocopy talks break down

Eurocopy, the photocopier distributor, said that possible bid talks begun in August had broken down. The shares fell 6p to 77p. Cyril Gay, chairman, said that he would now resume responsibility for continuing Eurocopy's expansion and acquisition programme.

Eurocopy said that results this year were likely to be in line with market expectations.

Argent deal

Argent, the property group, has bought the Fishergate shopping centre in Preston for £27.7 million. It is to finance the deal by placing 5.489 million new ordinary shares at 280p to raise £15.4 million before expenses. Fishergate, sold by Scottish Amicable, has net initial yield (after costs) of about 8.6 per cent.

Laporte change

Ken Minton is to retire as chairman of Laporte, the chemicals company, to be succeeded by George Duncan, his deputy, in non-executive capacity. Mr Minton, departing after the appointment of Jim Leng to succeed him as chief executive, said Laporte would "benefit from a conventional relationship between a non-executive chairman and the chief executive".

Hambro confident despite dip

By Marianne Curphey

HAMBRO Insurance Services, the legal expenses insurer to insurance consultancy group, has reported pre-tax profits down slightly to £3.03 million (£3.05 million) for the six months to September 30.

However, the group, whose chairman is Christopher Sporborg, said loss-adjusting fees after three hurricanes in the Caribbean and increased subsidence in the UK after the hot summer would push up profits for the full year.

Nicholas Page, managing director, said the company's loss-adjusting subsidiary had been suffering a "low level of incoming claims in the UK". Falling claims plus increased computerisation had led to redundancies in UK branches but further large job losses were not expected.

"It has been a tough market for everyone," he said.

Profits at Hambro Legal Protection, the core business, were down 5 per cent to £2.5 million (£2.6 million).

Earnings per share for the group dropped to 2.75p (2.94p) and the interim dividend remains unchanged at 1.85p per share.

Sporborg: forecasts increase

Rising costs a factor in 15% Volvo setback

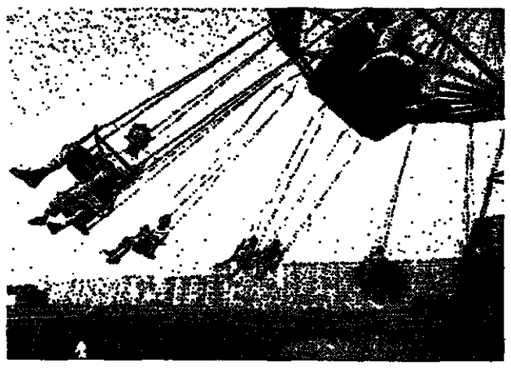

By Our World Trade Correspondent

ADVERSE currency movements, plus rising development and operating costs in the car division of Volvo, the Swedish automotive group, were the main factors behind a 15 per cent drop in group pre-tax profit to 10.8 billion kronor (£1.02 billion) in the first nine months.

Sören Gyll, group president, who has led Volvo back to its core business after a planned merger with Renault, of France, was aborted in 1993, said investment in the car side, which is being repositioned in the market, where it has added market share, would not be reflected in earnings for several years.

Mr Gyll said that concentration on core operations was continuing, and distribution of shares in Swedish Match to Volvo shareholders next year would let shareholders participate in the growth in value.

At operating level, group profits rose 27 per cent, to 8.84 billion kronor, reflecting strong demand for trucks, buses and cars.

SKF gets the wheels moving in Eastern Europe.

DURING THE SUMMER, SKF acquired 80% of the Polish bearing company FLT Poznan. This acquisition considerably increases SKF's market share in Poland.

During the coming year an investment of 100 million Swedish kronor will be made to ensure that the factory meets SKF Group standards.

Since the opening up of east-west relations, SKF has expanded its sales organisation and strengthened its presence in the East European market by setting up new companies in Poland, Bulgaria, Russia, Slovenia, Croatia, Macedonia, Slovakia, Latvia and Albania, at the same time establishing representation in Romania. SKF companies have operated in Hungary and the Czech Republic for some years. SKF's strategy is to expand in the region. Many of SKF's customers have invested in Poland during the past few years. Through the acquisition of the new factory, SKF is ensuring local bearing supplies to this important market.

RESULTS

SKF's consolidated income after financial income and expense for the first nine months of 1995 amounted to SEK 2 586 M, (1 141). Group sales increased 14.4 percent from SEK 24 631 M to SEK 28 177 M. The volume increase was slightly more than 10 percent. Income for the third quarter totaled SEK 720 M (324) and sales amounted to SEK 8 690 M (8 003).

SALES

Despite a general weakening of the market, SKF's sales to the North American automotive industry developed favourably. This was attributable to the increase in market share achieved by SKF in supplying bearings for new car models. During the third quarter, production began at the Group's second U.S. channel for wheel bearing units. A decision was also taken regarding investment in a third channel, to satisfy increasing demand.

The machinery segment remained strong in Europe and the U.S. with a positive trend noted for both Heavy and General Machinery. Demand was particularly strong for precision bearings.

The SKF Group reported operating income for the first nine months of the year of SEK 3 065 M (1 673) after depreciation. Net financial items amounted to SEK -479 M (-532) for the January-September period and SEK -124 M (-200) for the third quarter. Earnings per share after tax were SEK 14.70 (6.50). Capital expenditures in property, plant and equipment totalled SEK 1599 M (813). At the end of September, the Group's inventories totaled 23.4 percent (26.0) of annual sales. The return on capital employed was 18.4 percent (10.1) and the return on shareholders' equity was 21.4 percent (8.0). Group solvency was 32.0 percent (28.2).

FORECAST

Group volumes during 1995 are expected to increase by approximately 10 percent. The price trend is as expected and will be better than in the preceding year.

British contractors 'too expensive'

By Colin Narbrough

BRITISH contractors and suppliers frequently price themselves out of the international market and need to make a greater effort to win business, according to Cedric Brown, the chief executive of British Gas.

In a hard-hitting speech to the annual lunch in London of the British Consultants Bureau (BCB), Mr Brown, who has taken heavy flak over the size of his own remuneration package, said that three quarters of the bids by UK firms on his company's Miskar offshore project in Tunisia failed by more than 10 per cent on price. Almost a quarter were priced at more than double the winning bid.

He said that business was also lost to Britain because UK firms declined to bid in the first place. Both at British Gas's Miskar scheme and its Dolphin project in Trinidad, UK firms prequalified for 61 per cent of the procurement packages worth more than $100,000, but about half the companies sent tender documents declined to bid. For non-UK firms the drop-out rate was far smaller.

"It would be easy to call this typical British arrogance. In my view, it is much more a question if ignorance," Mr Brown said. "British firms need to find out what the competition is doing and adapt their working practices to compete effectively."

Mr Brown called for a "step change" in culture and working practice where new markets were concerned. He called on Britain's private and public sector to develop a "more coherent approach" like that already seen in rival economies.

Maxwell jury told of rescue plan

THE identity of a would-be rescuer of the Maxwell group had to be kept secret because of extreme sensitivity about an Arab-Israeli peace conference, a Central Criminal Court jury heard yesterday.

On his eighteenth day in the witness box, Kevin Maxwell described his hopes that a group of Abu Dhabi investors including the ruler of that country would inject £400 million into the crisis-hit group. The court has already heard that, through David Kimche, a former high-ranking Israeli government official, Kevin Maxwell had been introduced to businessman Roger Tamraz.

He said: "I knew Mr Tamraz to be independently wealthy," but he did not believe he would be the only investor. "I imagined that he would be leading a consortium or syndicate of investors. I was aware of the source of the funds being Abu Dhabi including the ruler of that country."

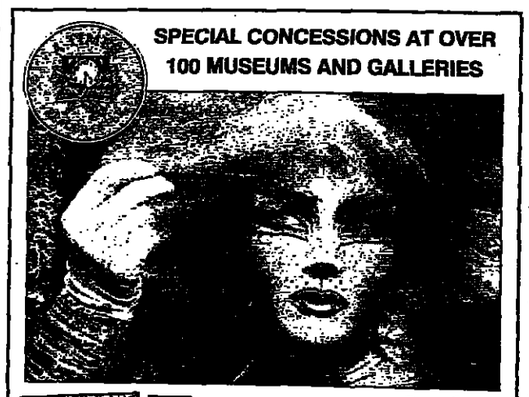

But Kevin said he had been advised not to reveal the identity of Mr Tamraz because of extreme sensitivity about the issue in the middle of a peace conference being held in Madrid between Arab nations and Israel.

Kevin, 36, his brother Ian, 39, and Larry Trachtenberg, 42, deny conspiracy to defraud by misusing shares the prosecution allege belonged to the pension fund. The case was adjourned until today.

ACCOUNTANCY

Stand by the benchmark test

Allan McNab on research done by an award-winning CIMA fellow

Ian Malcolm, a CIMA fellow, is chiselling away at the very bedrock of the arts and mysteries of financial management with his research on Benchmarking Finance Function Activities for an MSc at Manchester University.

That it has secured him the Accountancy Age 1995 award, which is sponsored by CIMA, for the "most useful piece of business research" is further evidence of its significance.

Benchmarking is essentially the process of measuring the performance of an organisation against other organisations. It ranks among the 25 most popular management tools used internationally, and Bain & Company, the consultant, reports that benchmarking has risen from sixth place in its league table in the 1980s to third today — led only by mission statements and customer surveys.

Ian Malcolm has taken the benchmarking technique boldly into the area of finance-function services. He has then put forward the measurement of the finance-function process as "a powerful barometer" (his words) of the effectiveness and quality of other associated processes within the business.

He pulls no punches in examining the performance of finance departments when it comes to assessing their own standards. "While other functions have introduced latest technology and developed new and more meaningful operating standards, the finance department has, relatively speaking, remained in the Middle Ages. We huff and puff but provide little or no evidence of having established standards to strive for, let alone improving upon them."

Working with a benchmark group of 25 companies, he has tried to establish the value of the financial function in businesses in comparison with its costs. He goes further, raising questions that might come from the boardroom, such as "Where does your finance function stand in relation to our raison d'être? Are your standards higher now than they were ten years ago?"

His targets have included establishing desirable performance data for the finance function by means of benchmarking research and putting that information into specific forms — to which he gives the term "metrics". He argues that "we must translate the desirable performance into 'metrics' against which we continually strive to improve".

The beauty of the benchmarking group approach, which CIMA is fostering through its interactive Employers Group, is that companies, as well as studying and monitoring the competition, have the opportunity to assess their performance against totally dissimilar businesses. Ian Malcolm cites the example of the company that is interested to learn through the group that there are more efficient ways of processing a purchase invoice. He points out: "Wouldn't you be curious if your organisation processed 35,000 invoices with the same number of staff as another that processes 115,000 invoices?"

Allan McNab welcomes the research on benchmarking

The "politically correct" benchmarking answer would be that neither company is anywhere near best practice. To get there they must achieve the invoice-less company. The CIMA Research Foundation last year spent £200,000 providing researched-based reports for business. Now the institute is looking at proposals for more research work including benchmarking. In particular, there is interest in supporting collaborative studies that will be of practical use to members.

I am delighted that his research has focused the finance function's attention on satisfying the internal customer. It is crucial that management accounting continues to keep up to date with the sophistication of its "customers" through the organisation as they in turn keep pace with the business environment.

There are many "soft" activities in industry and commerce that are hard to measure. Quality, and customer satisfaction, are just two examples. But they have to be measured if a business is to be confident about its performance. Benchmarking in collaboration with other business may not provide all the answers, but it is looking like an excellent path to follow.

Why taxpayers need a Mr Nice Guy

IF AN eminent tax QC can reduce members of the Inland Revenue to a barely controllable fury, you can be sure that he has struck a painful nerve. It is even more impressive when done with the most modest of proposals. This is what happened last week at the English ICA tax faculty's Philip Hardman memorial lecture. It was given by David Goldberg, a man whose eminence at the tax bar is combined with an ability to infuriate the Revenue. His contention was straightforward; his elaboration lengthy. He took more than an hour to build up his case, but only minutes to present his proposed reforms.

The underlying contention goes to the heart of the Revenue's changing philosophy. Goldberg would argue that the Revenue is a department of government, administering law. But, increasingly, the Revenue sees itself as a business with customers. The two are, in Goldberg's view, incompatible.

"The Revenue," he argued, "is not a business and taxpayers are not its customers, and to think of it as a business and of taxpayers as customers does not accurately represent the rights and obligations of the parties to the relationship. If we do not think of the nature of the organisation correctly, we will not be able to state what the rights and obligations of the parties should be, and if we do not know what the rights and obligations should be, we cannot measure properly how well or badly the parties are doing."

ROBERT BRUCE

What Goldberg's proposals sought to achieve was a way that taxpayers could gain some degree of justice if the tax officials treated them unfairly. That is an unarguable position in a fair society. But his contention was that the new split-personality of the Revenue meant almost that the definition of what is fair is now blurred beyond reasonable recognition. "If the Revenue were a business," he argued, "it would be allowed to be grasping and selective and to make exaggerated claims and, possibly, even occasionally to be spiteful. But the Revenue is not a business and it is not allowed to be any of these things."

His view was that the Revenue "should be honourable, judicious, careful and it should not be making exaggerated claims". You can see why he annoyed so many tax officials. "The Revenue," he continued, "should be administering, not making the law."

If you talk to others in Goldberg's position, you hear a great litany of examples of precisely how the Revenue, in a handful of cases, is behaving in the worst of, what he would call, business methods. Such examples are few and far between and many such instances are dealt with under appeals or via the office of the Inland Revenue Adjudicator.

But Goldberg proposed two further aids to ensuring justice for taxpayers. He first suggested that the onus for proof should be switched in cases where assessments have gone to appeal. The burden of proof should lie upon the Revenue, he argued. But more important, he argued that a tribunal should be set up "to control the exercise of the Revenue's power of care and management".

In particular, he suggested, that the tribunal "should, on the application of a taxpayer, be able to examine the correspondence in any particular matter and say whether it considers that the Revenue's conduct in the implementation of its duty is acceptable".

The tribunals could be modelled on VAT tribunals, but with lay members as chairmen rather than lawyers. Goldberg said he saw the role of the tribunal "effectively to be say: 'This correspondence has gone on long enough; you must now, to use the modern jargon, either put up or shut up'."

The aims would be simple, the procedures tending towards the unlegalistic and the results would be reported on a no-names basis.

"The key concept," he said, "is the acceptability to the general body of taxpayers of what is being done by the Revenue; the Revenue cannot be the best judge of this. I think the sort of mixed tribunal I am suggesting might be quite a good judge of it."

It was the sort of proposal that makes sense to a layman. But Leonard Beighton, a past deputy chairman of the Revenue, was hardly able to control his rage. The suggestion that taxmen could behave in a beastly way was unthinkable. But it was not the points, that he, and others, made that showed how close Goldberg was to his target. It was the absolute fury with which they expressed them.

The days of the Revenue being, as they put it, "user-friendly" may be ending. The US Internal Revenue Service, after a long period of customer-care programmes, has decided a "no more Mr Nice Guy" stance is more likely to bear fruit. Which suggests that now would be an appropriate time to implement Goldberg's modest and timely proposals.

ANY OTHER BUSINESS

Champion for radical change

GREAT taxmen bring change not only to statute and the law but also to the quality of life. A fine example was given by David Goldberg, QC, in the course of his Philip Hardman memorial lecture last week. Talking of Hardman's influence, he recalled the time when accountants were first granted direct access to barristers. The Revenue Bar Association wrote to the English ICA's tax faculty and asked what accountants would like to see when they instructed counsel. Hardman, as faculty chairman, replied: "Tea or coffee." Goldberg recalled: "He got it, and so produced a radical change to life at the Bar."

Taxing time

THINGS were not so jolly by the end of Goldberg's lecture. During questions, he came under attack from Leonard Beighton, past deputy chairman of the Inland Revenue. The attack was endorsed by Peter Wyman, of Coopers & Lybrand. This was considered off. In his days as chairman of the English ICA's tax faculty, Wyman was usually somewhat sceptical of the Revenue's abilities. But then loyalties can be divided. Beighton is his uncle.

That's life . . .

THE demise of the Carbolic Smoke Ball Company is one of those old company law cases embedded in every accountant's mind from examination days. Now Philip Jenks has revived it in an effort to provide amusement. He is marketing everything from "Accountancy was my life. . ." paperweights to "Trust me. I'm an accountant" sweatshirts. There is an excellent series of framed cartoons by Chic, whose work adorns the back page of Accountancy Age. Details on 01734 832811.

Under fire

NOT only does Andrew Colquhoun, the English ICA's chief executive, find himself out of favour as his plans to reverse the institute's graduate-only entry policy are questioned, he also has to suffer Scots' glee at his misfortunes. At the Scots' ICA's London dinner on Monday their president, Niall Lothian, fiercely underlined the Scots' commitment to educational standards. Presumably, he had noted Colquhoun's presence.

Building Businesses

INTERIM RESULTS FOR SIX MONTHS TO 30 SEPTEMBER 1995

Chairman's Statement

The financial results show continuing improvement in profit and dividend growth. The period has also seen the company actively pursuing its strategic objective of creating shareholder value by building the scope of our business. The most significant development towards this aim was our successful acquisition of Manweb, which was completed on 6 October 1995.

The combination of ScottishPower and Manweb has created a leading UK energy business with a current market capitalisation of some £3.3 billion. Our aim is to make this business one of the most efficient in the industry with a view to extending, over time, the range and quality of services we deliver to all our three million customers. Manweb is involved in a business we know extremely well. Our task is to apply the management expertise and skills we have proven within ScottishPower and in so doing deliver benefits for both customers and shareholders. We have made a sound start since arriving at Manweb and we are confident that we can deliver the value we have identified. Following the acquisition of Manweb we have made changes to the responsibilities of our Executive team. These are aimed at strengthening the focus both on the energy businesses and the strategic development of the group. We are fully committed to the development of our Scottish business. We are applying what we have learned from benchmarking, against international companies, to reshape our energy business. We have completed a reorganisation bringing together our Transmission and Distribution businesses into a Power Systems business and focusing Energy Supply on meeting the challenges of the competitive market in 1998. These changes will enable us to extend, in a cost effective way, the range and quality of service we offer. Our Generation business continues to be one of the lowest cost in the UK and we have developed in this, and our other electricity businesses, detailed programmes to deliver further efficiency improvements. Once again the Retail business has delivered a strong set of results, in a market which continues to be very competitive. Our other developing businesses, Gas and Telecoms are growing with both businesses significantly increasing their customer base. In Telecoms we were pleased to announce an agreement with Vodafone and also details of our plans to provide, economically, telecoms services to homes and small businesses in Scotland through the utilisation of the latest fixed radio technology. During the first six months of the year we delivered an increase in operating profit of 5.6% and dividend growth of 13.6% per share. In the second half of the year, we will see the inclusion of results from Manweb, together with the one off costs of its integration and the funding cost associated with our new level of debt. The Manweb acquisition is expected to be earnings enhancing in 1996/97.

Financial Report

For the six months to 30 September 1995 turnover of £777 million was 6.0% ahead of the equivalent period last year. The electricity business contributed £12 million of the £44 million increase with the remainder attributable to the developing businesses, particularly retail where turnover increased by £24 million. Operating profit rose by 5.6% to £133 million, an increase of £7 million. In the electricity businesses, Power System's contribution increased by £4 million as a result of higher use of system revenues. Operating profit from generation and first and second tier electricity sales combined was some £4 million higher. However lower pool prices in the first half of the year led to a £2 million increase in operating loss from wholesale trading in England and Wales. In our developing businesses the most notable change was in Retail which reported a £2 million increase in operating profit reflecting higher "like for like" sales and the inclusion for the first time of the former Clydesdale stores. Lower cash balances during the period, due entirely to the purchase of shares in Manweb, resulted in a £1.7 million increase in the net interest charge. Profit before tax at £128 million rose by 3.9%, which together with an unchanged tax rate for the half year of 27%, gave profit after tax of £93 million. With earnings per share of 11.43p, an increase of 3.8% on the previous half year and an interim dividend of 5.17p per share, an increase of 13.6%, the interim dividend was covered 2.2 times by earnings. Capital expenditure in the half year amounted to £80 million, compared with £85 million in the previous first half year. Higher investment in our transmission and distribution network, in generation and in telecoms was offset by lower expenditure on projects following the commissioning of our Knapton power station. There was an underlying net cash inflow of £157 million during the period, arising from cash generated by operations and improvements in working capital management. As a result, despite an investment of £183 million in the acquisition of Manweb shares, the net cash outflow for the six months to September was contained at £26 million, giving borrowings of £112 million. With shareholders' funds increasing to £1,159 million at 30 September 1995, gearing at the half year was 9.7%.

Acquisition of Manweb

On 6 October 1995, ScottishPower declared its offer for Manweb unconditional as to acceptances. ScottishPower declared its offer wholly unconditional on 12 October and the Board of Manweb recommended that its shareholders accept the offer. The then Board of Manweb resigned and ScottishPower appointed a new Board which included the appointment of Mike Kinski as Chief Executive. As at 3 November ScottishPower owned or controlled 95.6% of Manweb's shares. The integration of ScottishPower and Manweb is being led by Mike Kinski, an Executive Director of ScottishPower, supported by an experienced multi-functional team. Since arriving at Manweb the team has made a sound start. They have established control of the business and are currently verifying our pre-acquisition plans, which we expect to begin implementing by the end of 1995. We see opportunities to capitalise on the best practices developed by both companies and to eliminate the duplications which have arisen. The one off costs of integrating the two businesses will be included in ScottishPower's 1995/96 results in accordance with FRS 7. We are confident that we can deliver significant benefits for ScottishPower's shareholders from the acquisition. It is expected that earnings per share will be enhanced in the financial year 1996/97. In recognition of this we have increased the half year dividend by 13.6% and we can confirm that we intend to make a similar increase at the full year bringing the total net dividend to 15.5p for the year ending 31 March 1996. After 1995/96 the company's stated dividend aim will remain the achievement of sustainable real dividend growth of 5-6% per annum. Gearing is projected to be not more than 75% at 31 March 1996.

Business Report

We have reorganised our energy business to enable us to exploit the opportunities created by the liberalisation of the electricity market in 1998. A new business, Energy Supply, has been formed to manage and administer all the customer sales and services for both electricity and gas and to develop new markets for ScottishPower. A substantial investment will be made to establish a new centralised Customer Call Centre, located in Glasgow, which will be fully operational in July 1996. This centre will use the latest technology to provide customers with a faster and more efficient service while at the same time reducing the cost of our operations. The electricity network, comprising both the high voltage transmission and distribution networks, has become the responsibility of a newly established Power Systems business. By bringing these two businesses together we will be able to take advantage of opportunities to control costs further, while improving system performance. As a consequence of these two programmes outlined above, which we announced in June, we will achieve a rationalisation of 9 district offices into 4 regional centres. This will lead to a reduction of 350 in the number of employees. ScottishPower was not involved in the second distribution review undertaken by the Director General of Electricity Supply earlier in the year. No further review of the regulatory parameters applying to ScottishPower's distribution business, excluding metering, is expected before April 2000, recognising that it is already one of the lowest cost operators in the UK. Our power stations continue to generate some of the lowest cost electricity in the UK and produce a return on sales which was higher than either National Power or PowerGen for the financial year ended 1994/95, after stripping out nuclear purchases. Following the announcement of the Government's intention to privatise British Energy, discussions have begun with Scottish Nuclear Limited regarding issues surrounding the Nuclear Energy Agreement. These discussions are still at an early stage and our aim is to ensure that there will be no adverse impact for our shareholders. We are growing our share of the UK generation market and expect, subject to planning approvals, the transmission link with England and Wales to be operational at the full capability of 2,200MW in late 1997. We anticipate the capability of the link will average at around 1,100MW for this year, while essential work is carried out in preparation for the upgrade. We expect the revenue from sales outside Scotland will be higher in the second half of the year as pool prices rise to meet the annual average pool price cap. Planning inquiries into the 250MW transmission link to Northern Ireland have also been completed and subject to a positive outcome, trading across the link will commence no later than 1999. In the electricity businesses and central services manpower numbers at 30 September had fallen over the six months since 31 March 1995 to 5,180, a reduction of 2.6%, bringing the total company manpower to 7,964. The gas supply market continues to be very competitive. Our gas strategy recognises this and the gas contracts we have entered into are principally for utilisation in our generation business. Gas is an important component of our fuel strategy to reduce emissions from our power stations. Our gas supply business now has some 6,900 customer sites throughout the UK and we continue to look forward to the liberalisation of the gas market in 1998. The Retail business has continued to perform strongly, in a very competitive market. Half year sales increased due to higher "like for like" sales and the inclusion, for the first time, of revenues from the stores acquired from the Clydesdale Group. The stores purchased in March 1995 from Manweb have been successfully integrated and are trading above our expectations. ScottishTelecom is growing and developing as a regional communications business. It now supplies, either directly or indirectly, services to over 80 Scottish business customers and has secured contracts to link all the Scottish universities via a common fibre optic network. The recently announced agreement with Vodafone and our other initiatives will enable us to provide a greater range of telecoms services. By 1997 we will be able to access homes and small business customers in Scotland in a cost effective manner using fixed radio based technology. Our Electrical Contracting and Technology businesses continue to grow profitably. They support our electricity businesses while at the same time developing a portfolio of external contracts. The Technology business has recently won a 3 year contract from Scottish Nuclear Limited and Electrical Contracting is currently working for large multi-nationals such as NEC and Motorola.

Summary

The first half of the year has seen a good performance from the company. We have achieved sound financial results, while at the same time developing our existing business and successfully completing a major acquisition. The combination of ScottishPower and Manweb has created a leading UK energy business. Our aim is to make this business one of the most efficient in the industry. We have made a sound start since arriving at Manweb and I am confident that we will deliver the anticipated benefits for our stakeholders. We are fully committed to the development of our Scottish business and we have a number of initiatives to improve efficiency and enhance the quality of services we deliver to our customers. The second half of the year has started satisfactorily and we look forward to achieving full year results in line with our expectations.

Review Report by the Auditors

To Scottish Power plc We have reviewed the interim financial information for the six months ended 30 September 1995 set out on pages 4 to 10 which is the responsibility of, and has been approved by, the directors. Our responsibility is to report on the results of our review.

Our review was carried out having regard to the Bulletin "Review of Interim Financial Information", issued by the Auditing Practices Board. This review consisted principally of applying analytical procedures to the underlying financial data, assessing whether accounting policies have been consistently applied, and making enquiries of management responsible for financial and accounting matters. The review excluded audit procedures such as tests of controls and verification of assets and liabilities and was therefore substantially less in scope than an audit performed in accordance with Auditing Standards. Accordingly we do not express an audit opinion on the interim financial information.

On the basis of our review:

- in our opinion the interim financial information has been prepared using accounting policies consistent with those adopted by Scottish Power plc in its financial statements for the year ended 31 March 1995, and
- we are not aware of any material modifications that should be made to the interim financial information as presented.

Rodney Hobson introduces a two-page report on the international impact and earning power of British overseas consultancies

Britons at work the world over

The biggest change in the 30-year history of the British Consultants Bureau (BCB) was overwhelmingly agreed by members yesterday. The annual general meeting agreed to open up membership to individuals as well as companies.

Although the issue has never been put to the vote before, a consensus in favour of individual membership has been growing. Even before the meeting, 50 people were lined up to join at a £550 subscription rate. They include a judge who has served in the remains of the British colonial system. The bureau is setting up a database designed to help individual members, who will be entitled to the same facilities as companies and will be able to attend meetings.

The decision acknowledges the changes that have taken place since the Department of Trade and Industry and the Association of Consulting Engineers set up the bureau to promote the work of UK consultants overseas.

The objectives were, and still are, entirely commercial. The new individual members will not acquire letters after their names. Rather, like the existing corporate members, they will use the bureau to secure commissions overseas.

The bureau has a sophisticated intelligence gathering operation. Its computer system is tapped into the European Union and agencies such as the World Bank and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development that form a vital source of work. This helps UK companies to maintain a commanding position in aid work. For example, more than 40 per cent of the EBRD's consultancy work goes to British firms.

From a narrow base the organisation has grown to encompass more than 100 sectors and disciplines. Although consulting engineers remain an important part of the bureau, and include some of the largest members, the growth of highly specialised consultancies has brought in a raft of smaller businesses.

Engineers now comprise 31.7 per cent of membership. The second largest grouping is niche disciplines, which account for 27.1 per cent of membership, followed by architects and planners on 12.9 per cent. An indication of the spread of membership is shown by the fact that solicitors account for 4 per cent of membership. Overseas consultants now include fire prevention experts, bankers and market researchers. Specialisations include golf courses, hotels, agriculture, healthcare and further education.

Well over half the existing corporate members have fewer than 50 employees. More than a fifth have ten or fewer staff. Only one company in 30 employs more than 1,000.

However, the number of large companies is growing as medium-sized companies are merging or being taken over. The bureau says its members have indicated that this trend, seen in 1994, has been in evidence again this year and is likely to continue.

> UK companies hold a commanding position in aid work

Polarisation can make sense in the highly competitive world of overseas consultancy that has seen fees driven down for several years. The move is towards being very strong the world over or being a very clever specialist.

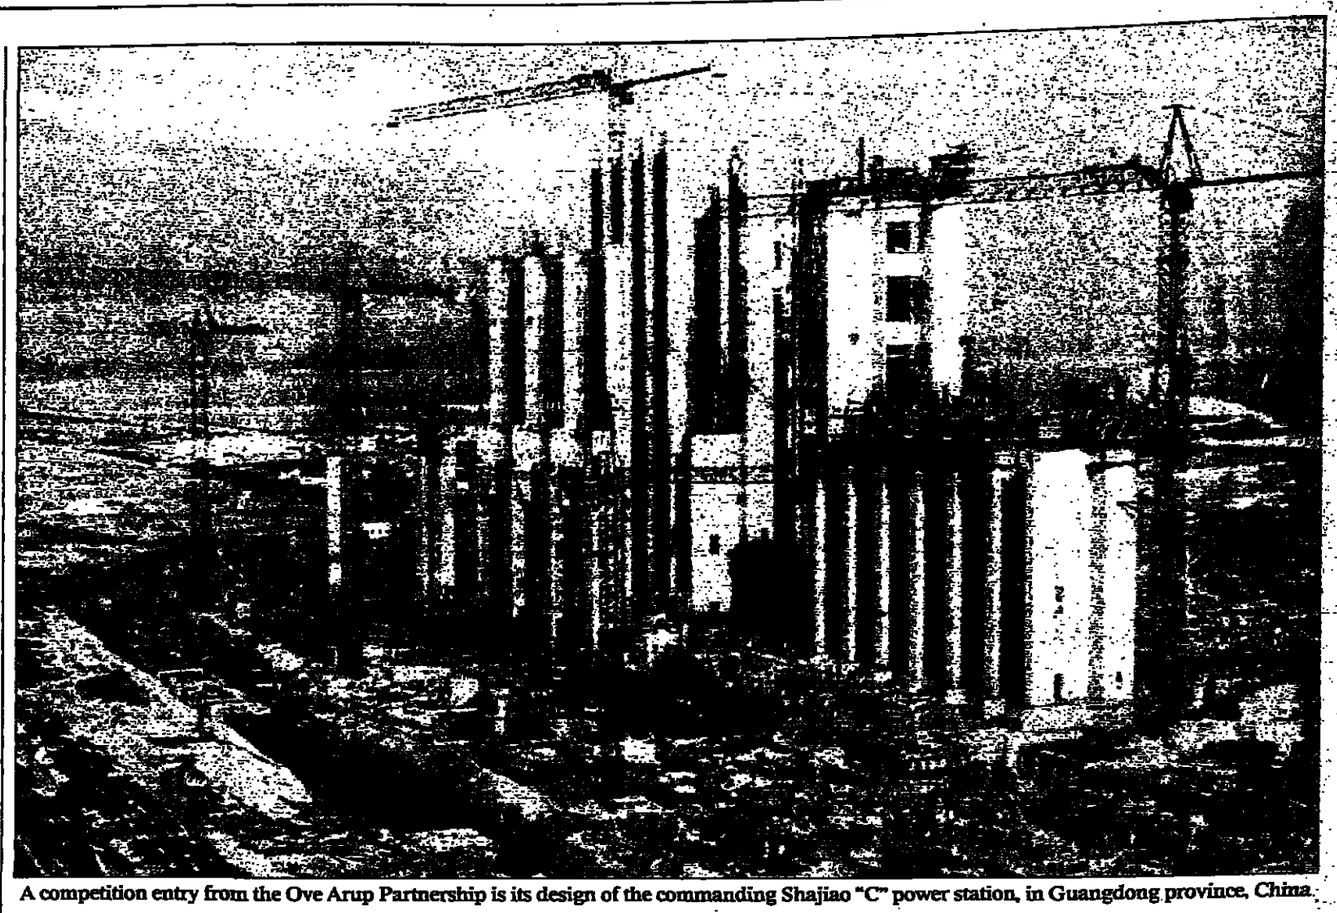

Large companies are increasingly opening up offices in key countries or setting up joint partnerships with local firms. Local offices enable consultancy firms to bid for work that they would not have obtained had they been seen as solely UK-based. Smaller companies do not have the resources to market themselves around the world, but are invaluable in providing specialist services to the international-based members. Word of mouth is still an important source of work.

This networking is helped by the strong support of the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department of the Environment and the Foreign Office through the Overseas Development Administration. Although BCB members are not given preferential treatment when it comes to the awarding of contracts, British ambassadors and embassy commercial officers pop in to the bureau when they return on leave. The Foreign Office also arranges for visiting ministers from other governments to discuss projects in their domain on London visits.

British overseas consultants still endeavour to maintain the independence that has made them sought-after around the world. British firms seeking project work continue to snipe if the consultants recommend foreign contractors.

The British Consultants Bureau claims, however, that for every £1 of consultancy fees earned, a further £10-£15 is spent in Britain because of the goodwill engendered. Despite the intense international competition that is depressing fees, British consultants pushed up their fee income last year to £1.6 million from £1.5 million in 1993. The bureau says that if the consultants do a good job, then clients will prefer to bring further work here because they feel they can trust the British.

The bureau also points out that the barriers are breaking down between consultancy and contracting, so that many projects are awarded to a consortium that can design, build and operate.

A competition entry from the Ove Arup Partnership is its design of the commanding Shajiao "C" power station, in Guangdong province, China.

No corner is left untouched

British experts are to be found at the centre of business from Strasbourg to Tanzania

A three-pronged attack was chosen by Ove Arup Partnership for its entry for the 1995 British Consultancy Firm of the Year, Rodney Hobson writes. Ove Arup submitted details of its designs for the new European Court of Human Rights building in Strasbourg, the TGV station, conference centre and office retail development at Lille and a power station in Guangdong province in southern China.

Owing to the increase in the number of member states of the Council of Europe since the construction of its original building, the European Court of Human Rights had outgrown its premises and commissioned a new, larger building on a site near by.

The dramatic political upheavals in Eastern Europe during the design period led to a revision of the estimated growth of the organisation during the life of the building.

Ove Arup's brief was modified to increase the floor area by 40 per cent. The changes were incorporated in a redesign while construction of the office wings was in progress.

The rapidly growing demand for electricity in Indonesia led to the submission from Mott Ewbank Preece for its contribution to the Muara Karang 500-megawatt power station on the north coast of Java.

About 3,000 of Indonesia's 13,000 islands, stretching more than 3,000 miles, are inhabited. The large distances between centres of population strain the distribution of power supplies, which consist of 650 separate systems mainly serving a town or district. They range in size from a single diesel generator to the Java-Bala interconnected system.

Industrial and domestic demand continues to outstrip supply. The industrial sector grew by 20 to 25 per cent a year in the 1980s and demand for supply is still increasing at 12 to 13 per cent, probably the highest sustained growth rate in the world.

The true demand is even higher but is masked by supply shortages.

There are long waiting lists for new connections — even in areas already electrified — and supplies in the outer islands are still limited to population centres. Almost all rural areas want electricity but face a delay of several years.

The growing gap betwen power supply and demand is an obstacle to economic growth. To ease the desperate shortage, the Indonesian Government introduced a programme to develop a number of power schemes that could be built quickly, including Muara Karang.

The Tanwat energy programme in Tanzania is modest by the standards of industrialised countries but is a model example of the contribution that British engineering consultants can make in the world's poorer regions. W. S. Atkins took the project from the initial feasibility study through construction, manufacture and erection to final commissioning.

It transformed an inefficient, unreliable power system into one tailored for rural Tanzania. The wood-fuelled system more than satisfies local demand and excess electricity can be transmitted elsewhere in the country.

Environmental Resources Management assessed the potential impact on noise levels and air quality of the construction and operation of the 22-mile railway from Hong Kong island to the new airport at Chek Lap Kok.

The other nominations for British Consultancy Firm of the Year are Northern Ireland Electricity International for maintaining power supplies for three winters in Bosnia; Atkins DGI for refurbishing the neo-natal facility in Nefteugansk, Siberia; and E. C. Harris for advising Tesco on expansion of its retailing chain in Hungary.

Bringing power to the people in a time of war

How small businesses win commissions to work overseas

THE TROUBLES in Northern Ireland pale in comparison with events in Bosnia but an intrepid team from Northern Ireland Electricity International spent two years in the Balkans maintaining power supplies, Rodney Hobson writes.

NIE, a small consultancy specialising in technical assistance for power utilities in developing countries, was first approached by the Overseas Development Administration in October 1992 to go to central Bosnia. It was to assess the state of power and heating systems in areas where refugees were congregating. A harsh winter was expected. Within two days a suitable team had been picked and two days later members were in the field. The assignment took two weeks to complete. Access by United Nations land convoy was slow and dangerous.

The report found that equipment was in surprisingly good condition and was manned by competent and enthusiastic staff but vital spares and fuel supplies were needed.

Within a few weeks NIE was commissioned to implement the recommendations of the report. Four engineers and a finance officer were assigned to work alongside coal mining consultants, also from the UK. More than £5 million of supplies were provided to keep electricity supplies going. The job was intended to last two weeks. In the event, the team made life more tolerable for Bosnians through three winters. NIE has just been awarded a third contract.

NIE was one of two nominations for the small consultancy category. Its rival was Huckle and Partners, for the architectural design of the Ministry of Justice at Muscat in the Sultanate of Oman.

The project completed a series of government ministry buildings designed to reflect the spirit of the Arab and Islamic worlds in the late 20th century.

The secret of opening doors

Colin Adams on the success of the British Consultants Bureau

A major ingredient in the outstanding success of British consultants overseas is their ability to flush out new markets and consolidate the old. The public perception of rather tired British exporters, unsupported by Government and constantly seen off by their German, French and Japanese counterparts, is far from the reality of the situation.

British consultants are invariably high in the league tables of contracts awarded both by the international aid agencies — the World Bank, the EU, European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (of which we earn 42 per cent of all contracts awarded) and Asian Development Bank — and in the race for privately funded projects.

Part of the secret lies in knowing how to open the doors of decision-makers and potential clients in target capitals. Getting access is often extremely difficult for a company on its own, but invariably very easy as part of a British Consultants Bureau (BCB) mission. Each year the BCB conducts some six major overseas missions, all of which are carefully chosen from regions where members are doing well in winning commissions or are likely to do so in future. A mission to Poland led by Lord Fraser took place in September. Another, accompanied by the Duke of Gloucester, has just returned from three Indian states, Kuala Lumpur and a potentially exciting market, Burma (now known as Myanmar).

Earlier this year, the Bureau went to meet the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza, and then on to Damascus. Forthcoming missions in 1996 will include South Africa, Indonesia, Vietnam, the Philippines, Spain, the Ivory Coast, Romania and Bulgaria.

All too often trade missions from developed countries make awful mistakes by adopting a patronising manner, telling clients what to do and making no concessions for local conditions and capabilities. There are still some sensitivities, particularly in former colonies. British consultant firms learnt the lesson the hard way many years ago. Hence the title of the recent Mission to India, Kuala Lumpur and Burma — "Partnership for Success".

> Goodwill for British business is generated by UK-trained personnel

There must also be close co-operation with the ambassador and commercial staff of British diplomatic posts overseas whose work often goes unsung. They do a great deal of preparatory work, have a good knowledge of local business, and normally escort missions during their stay.

The Duke of Gloucester, a qualified architect, has been the president of the BCB for the past 15 years. He makes a point of accompanying one mission every year. His role is invaluable in promoting consultancy and ensuring access to senior public sector figures. The mission this October began in Calcutta with a series of calls on the ministers of the West Bengal Government and Calcutta city authorities. Joint seminars were held with the Confederation of Indian Industries (CII) in Calcutta and in Bangalore.

It is at this type of function and at the receptions arranged by the British High Commission and the Indians themselves that the work of making contacts really takes place. It is striking that having consultants from such disparate sectors as consulting engineers, housing, lawyers, further education, the food chain, architects, tourism, sport and leisure, works far better than taking a single sector group who are all vying with each other for the same work. Several memoranda of understanding for future collaboration were signed. Nevertheless, the local press were disappointed that firm contracts had not been signed there and then.

It is worth making the point that consultancy is not like selling chocolate bars; you rarely take a firm order away immediately for this type of work. Nevertheless, it was particularly satisfying that some of the smaller firms — notably the tourism and leisure consultants and the food chain experts — were able virtually to finalise several projects. They have subsequently signed contracts.

As Burma adapts and opens itself to the outside world, it is fast becoming a useful potential market for the UK. Unquestionably, outside commercial involvement rather than isolation is a useful tool in bringing about change.

Burma is a striking example of the positive effects of training overseas students in Britain. In every ministry the majority of senior public sector officials seemed to have been to British universities or centres of further education.

The shortsightedness of our Treasury policy today in insisting that overseas students are not subsidised and must pay "an economic price" is beyond belief. It makes no allowance whatsoever for the enormous goodwill for British business generated by UK-trained personnel when they reach positions in their own countries.

● Colin Adams is director of the British Consultants Bureau.

Warm start: the £400,000 neo-natal clinic at Nefteugansk used British consultants

In from the Siberian cold

CONSULTANTS OF THE YEAR

The harsh climate of Siberia presented a tough challenge to Basil Sawczuk, one of the five nominees for the individual British consultant of the year title. Rodney Hobson writes.

Although the temperature drops as low as -50C in the winter, it can also hit 35C in summer, when mosquitoes abound.

On behalf of Atkins DGI he picked up the commission to refurbish the 1960s built neo-natal facility at Nefteugansk on the river Ob to the east of the Ural mountains.

He says: "Nefteugansk means oil town. It is in what was the main oil and gas region of the old Soviet Union, a region that accounted for a large proportion of the country's foreign currency earning exports. In the old days the wealth was drained off into Moscow and the old Soviet empire and hardly any money found its way back to Siberia."

Presidential campaigns by Mikhail Gorbachev and Boris Yeltsin brought promises of fair play for Nefteugansk. Initially the cash financed a polyclinic using British consultants. The £400,000 neo-natal clinic continued the good work.

A harsh climate also failed to deter Peter Humphreys of Hunting Technical Services, who was adviser on a project to help 57,000 people living in 51 villages along the Atbara river in Sudan. Annual rainfall in the semi-desert environment is less than 50mm a year.

Two Asian airports feature in the individuals' list: Geoff Hillier of Sir William Halcrow and Partners at Kuala Lumpur in Malaysia, and Robin Whalley of Mott MacDonald in Hong Kong.

Mr Hillier was project director for engineering planning, bulk earthworks and drainage works at Sepang airport. Rapid air traffic growth and constraints on expansion at Kuala Lumpur's existing airport at Subang led to the decision to build a new airport 50 miles south of the Malaysian capital. The £2.5 billion first phase to take 25 million passengers a year is due to open in January 1998.

Mr Whalley was also a project director at a new airport, taking responsibility for the terminal design at Chek Lap Kok on the northern side of Lantau island. The £1.2 billion terminal will be the world's largest single airport building with 5 million sq ft of floor space on five levels and stretching for nearly three quarters of a mile.

Richard Grainger of EC Harris was nominated for his advice to Tesco, the supermarket chain, on costs and the availablity of supplies for retail outlets in Hungary.

Tesco acquired a 60 per cent holding in Global TH, a Hungarian retail chain operating 44 small corner stores, last year. Tesco's aim is to build a chain of up to 20 larger stores over the next five years and refurbish the existing stores. Capital spending could reach £50 million.

Have job, will travel

Rodney Hobson on those with a tremendous pioneering spirit

Just five countries in the entire world survived 1994 without the ministrations of a British consultant. One, understandably, was Iraq, still gripped by post-Gulf War sanctions.

The others, according to the latest figures available from the British Consultants Bureau, were Djibouti, Liberia, Togo in Africa and Nauru, the tiny island state in the middle of the Pacific. All have, however, been sources of work for British consultants in the past and the bureau is confident that they will be again in the future.

Colin Adams, the bureau's director, says: "It is extraordinary, the countries that British consultants are prepared to go to. They are willing to work in appalling conditions. Our people still have tremendous pioneering spirit."

The ability of British consultants to win work from aid agencies takes the bureau's members round the globe. Although the Japanese are keen competitors in consultancy and construction, Japanese companies are willing to use British consultants because of their reputation for independence.

The Russian Federation, Hong Kong and China led the way in providing work for British consultants, the bureau's statistical survey for 1994 shows. Consultants opened up more offices in east and central Europe and in the Asia Pacific region. Some took advantage of the opening up of Vietnam and Cambodia.

Asia Pacific accounts for some of the biggest projects. Although only about a quarter of bureau members worked there during the year, the region acounted for nearly half of all fee income earned.

Despite the non-appearance of British consultants in three African countries, the Continent plus the Middle East accounted for nearly a third of fee income. Another area of potential is South America and the Caribbean. However, language barriers and worries over the ability of some countries to pay have held back British consultants.

Reports from about half of the bureau's membership of nearly three million showed that 41 had worked on projects in Russia and 40 in Hong Kong. Fears that opportunities might dry up in the colony after it reverts to China in mid-1997 seem unfounded. China itself provided openings for 38 of the firms in the survey.

Russia and Eastern Europe have benefited from World Bank projects and also from the European Union's Technical Assistance to the Commonwealth of Independent States (Tacis) fund.

Chris Green, regional director at Halcrow, says the key to success in winning work in Eastern Europe is local partnership, appropriate financing and "a network of experts ready to undertake whatever issues are thrown at them".

Halcrow is in a partnership undertaking pre-investment studies for an upgrading of the Czech Republic's mainline rail routes. Maintenance has been neglected and the heavy use of the tracks for freight during the Soviet era has caused a deterioration in the track and some structures.

... but the laughs in the whimsical When Night is Falling are strictly unintentional

Black Panthers ill-served by layers of whitewash

NEW FILMS: Mario Van Peebles's revisionist Panther is too biased to make an impact, says Geoff Brown

Simplifications are dangerous. Watching Panther, you may be left with the impression that the American civil rights movement of the 1960s and the rise of drugs in black ghettos can all be traced to a bad traffic intersection.

On Market and 55th Streets in Oakland, California, pedestrians were being killed. The black community demanded a traffic light; the white police were unmoved. Enter the Black Panther Party for Self-Defence, a volatile but well-meaning group, armed with guns and dedicated to the health and safety of its people. Enter, too, the FBI, which sought every means, drugs included, to neutralise the black community and liquidate their guardian angels.

History suggests that issues and motives were more complex than this, especially on the Panthers' side. But Mario and Melvin Van Peebles's film has no time for delicate shadings. There is so much to cram into two hours: historical figures like Panther founders Bobby Seale and Huey Newton, and its fiery propagandist Eldridge Cleaver; fictional creations such as Judge, the average, decent citizen swept up into the party's struggles. Actor-turned-director Mario Van Peebles increases the bustle by pummelling us with forceful imagery. Every scene must pack a wallop, or the young audience might fidget.

The cartoon approach also stems from the ideological bias of the script, by Mario's father Melvin. His incendiary film Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song helped to stir the black cinema renaissance 25 years ago. Amid the bedlam, you hear the noises of axes grinding, and whitewash applied to the Panther personnel, whose only admitted fault is an excess of zeal. The lines between fiction, supposition and fact are as blurred as they were in JFK.

Since the film's main audience was scarcely born when the Panthers raged, something obviously needed to be done to fit the story to America's current mood, made more belligerent since the O.J. Simpson trial. But there was surely still room for greater subtlety, and a few peeps at the wider context of 1960s protest.

The film's best qualities are its hurtling pace and sense of humour: note the naivety of some Panther participants as they sell Chairman Mao's Red Book on the Berkeley campus. As a history lesson, Panther is unreliable; as entertainment, it remains patchy.

And now, drag queens; although the coy and cumbersomely titled To Wong Foo Thanks for Everything, Julie Newmar is not really aimed at the gay community. Its ideal audience is Middle America. Eyes may widen at the opening spectacle of that nice Patrick Swayze in tiara, necklace and a fine 1950s ball gown, but nothing will disturb people's equilibrium. British director Beeban Kidron's film stands up for tolerance and empowerment: worthy goals, to be sure, but did the outcome have to be so flat and simpering?

Wong Foo was surely helped on its way by The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert, an international hit. There, three Australian drag queens were stranded in the desert. Here, three New Yorkers, plus a bottomless suitcase of frocks and wigs, kick their high heels in a nowhere town while their car is repaired and a redneck cop, victim of a swift kick from Swayze, lurches in pursuit. The title derives from an autographed portrait of the luscious 1960s icon, carried for luck.

Douglas Carter Beane, the scriptwriter, hails from the theatre; and you can spot the proscenium arch in the way characters are dumped in one place to thrash out their problems, speech by speech. Once Swayze, Wesley Snipes and John Leguizamo reach Snyderville, deep in the Midwest, the film just sits, energy fading by the minute, until a sentimental, drawn-out conclusion.

The spectacle droops, too. After the flurry of excitement of seeing macho stars in drag, you start to notice how uncomfortable Snipes looks, especially when acting girlish. The star turn belongs to Leguizamo: his spitfire character, Chi Chi, is the only one to bridge the genders successfully. Nothing in the film, however, captures the revelry, glamour and personal tragedies so well as in the drag documentary Paris is Burning. This is a heavily pasteurised movie, all flavour gone, barely worth drinking.

With a title like Living in Oblivion you expect to find some latter-day Dostoevsky moaning at the audience in black-and-white. Chunks of Tom DiCillo's second feature are indeed in monochrome, but gloom is nowhere. This is one of the year's funniest films, a sprightly look at the chaotic process of making a movie.

The action unfolds on the set of a low-budget New York project. Or at least the action would unfold if only traffic sound did not filter through, or a light did not blow, or a preening, bubble-headed actor stopped misbehaving. Steve Buscemi plays the film's frazzled director. According to a New Yorker quotation used in American advertisements, he combines "the eyes of Don Knotts [a bug-eyed comedian], the tresses of D'Artagnan, and the soul of a poet".

Oblivion does not deserve such hyperbole: one of its pleasures is its modesty, its refusal to follow the narcissistic path of DiCillo's first feature, Johnny Suede. Nonetheless, Buscemi's performance is delicious: the centrepiece in a human gallery ranging from James LeGros's blond bonehead actor to the grungy cameraman of Dermot Mulroney, who misses a perfect take by throwing up in the bathroom.

Oblivion began as an off-the-cuff short, and for all the clever juggling between films, real life and dreams, its expansion to feature length shows signs of strain. But the cast keeps the show on the road. And you can forgive much in an independent film that looks at itself in a crazy mirror, never cheapens the characters' emotions, and, best of all, generates so much laughter.

When Night is Falling is funny too, although few of the laughs are intentional. This is the third feature by Patricia Rozema, the Canadian director of I've Heard the Mermaids Singing. Its intentions cannot be faulted, and romantics of all persuasions should be rooting for Camille, a Protestant college professor toying with marriage to a theologian, as she unbuttons her life and falls for the charms of Petra, performer in an avant-garde circus. Unfortunately, Rozema keeps throwing up obstacles to enjoyment.

Take the arch whimsy. To reach the characters we must negotiate a haze of attempted magic realism, mythology, biblical teachings and hang-gliding. And there are no flames of passion to help to his mouth sewn up, probably in revenge for his American accent.

Such films are almost enough to drive you back to The Sound of Music, revived in all its saccharine glory. This was first released in the turbulent year of 1965, although you can never tell from the craftsmanlike plod of Robert Wise's direction, the Alpine scenery, the dainty songs, or Julie Andrews's smiling teeth. One week before the New York opening, Malcolm X was shot dead. The next year, Newton and Seale formed the Black Panthers. This week's films, most oddly, seem to have come full circle.

As a history lesson, Panther is unreliable and full of the noises of axes grinding, but forceful imagery and hurtling pace may give it broad appeal among young audiences

Troupers' tales fail to charm

DONALD COOPER

Howard McGillin's Sennett has the subtlety of a steam train, but the show is lifted by the impish Caroline O'Connor and her big, brash songs

THEATRE

Mack and Mabel
Piccadilly

If your taste runs to musicals with aggressive American workaholic showbiz monomaniacs as main characters, you now have a choice. Jolson at the Victoria Palace strikes me as the less appealing of the two shows on offer, despite its efforts to sweeten the odious singer at its centre. Jerry Herman and Michael Stewart's Mack and Mabel is more fun, though here the opposite process has occurred. Never do you believe Chaplin's claim, quoted in the programme, that its film-director protagonist would "stand and giggle until his whole body began to shake". The Mack Sennett at the Piccadilly has the jolly charm of a Mack truck.

That is especially troubling, for he is the show's narrator as well as its principal participant. He mooches into the grey area outside a studio in which a talkie is being shot and starts to reminisce about his own silent movies and, in particular, his star and former mistress, Mabel Normand. And off we go, first to Brooklyn, then to Hollywood, to hear what any cineaste will tell you is a pretty revisionist tale of their intertwined lives and careers.

The revisionism matters little. Even the sentimental, upbeat ending that replaces the one first seen in 1974 does nothing worse than make nonsense of the elegiac opening. Still less is there a problem in the audio department. Herman's music is tuneful and energetic, and his lyrics have class and punch. "Dozens of blundering cops in a thundering chase, getting a bang out of lemon meringue in the face, bandits attacking a train, one little tramp with a cane, movies were movies when I ran the show."

But problems there clearly were 20 years ago, for the musical failed on Broadway, and problems there still are — prime among them the chap who sings those words. Maybe a more subtle actor could suggest that beneath gauleiter Sennett, who regarded acting as a form of drill, there was a more creative sort of Sennett. But Howard McGillin has not found him. His Mack drives through the show like a steam locomotive, panting out vowels and pounding out consonants in what one might call the Union Pacific style of singing and acting.

A trainspotter might fancy him, but it is hard to see why as spritely a dame as Caroline O'Connor's Mabel should. She is the evening's success, an actress who bubbles with crafty humour, yet can deliver big, brash songs. When she is in flow, especially in the first act, the show perks up. The trouble with the second half is not just that she ages and hardens a bit, but she spends longish periods in her dressing room, leaving what at times feels like a vacuum on stage.

That helps to explain why Michael Smuin's choreography, skimpy in the first half, comes more into its own in the second. Mack mentions that with the talkies came songs, and with songs came dance, and, lo, we have a long, irrelevant tap number. But the chorus is under-used, as are the silent-movie sequences and most of the supporting characters. I felt especially sorry for Philip Herbert's Fatty Arbuckle, who has little to do but bumble about. How can one of the century's great orgiasts be treated as offhandedly as that?

BENEDICT NIGHTINGALE

DANCE

Javier de Frutos
Purcell Room

Javier de Frutos is one of my favourite dance artists — virtuosic, colourful and astonishing. Now, though, after watching his new two-part piece, Sweetie J and Meeting J, at the Purcell Room (for Dance Umbrella) I also feel that I know him a good deal more intimately.

De Frutos dances naked throughout. He is vulnerable and alone save for a few equally naked lightbulbs, a spoon, a glass of water and four (clothed) musicians who play two scores by Béla Bartók. This is performance literally stripped bare: not only solo, but devoid even of the usual protection of clothes.

De Frutos says that he finds nudity comfortable. He says the effect is asexual, which it is, and disclaims any gay-political agenda, aiming instead for something more universal.

He has the repertoire of a chameleon, changing from one portrait to another and back again. He swivels his hips like a belly dancer, adjusts the picture slightly to become a narcissistic belle, absorbed in the spoon he holds up like a hand mirror, then shifts once more to dip the spoon in the glass of water and lick it like a child with ice-cream. Sometimes incarnations seem superimposed on one another, so that a balletically waving arm could be the snaking postures of flamenco instead.

He flexes his deltoids like a body-builder, launches into alarmed tip-toe scurries like a small girl, advances in the archaic profile of an Egyptian slave. With each he formulates a set of phrases, modifying them, elaborating them, picking them up again later.

Self-mockery and humour are never far. But he says he intended Sweetie J (to one of Bartók's Romanian Folk Dances) to be romantic, which is presumably why it closes with him pointing to individual spectators and declaring "I love you" and "I love you, no, not you, the one behind". Meeting J, which follows almost seamlessly, is by contrast more austere — a harsh, continuous dance driven by the tough textures of the Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion.

Schools Prom
Albert Hall

Wider still and wider. No sooner, it seems, has the last errant party popper popped, and the last Elgarian breath been drawn, than the lungs are filling again for three Land of Hope and Glorys within three days at the Albert Hall.

The Schools Prom has always made more noise than its big brother has ever dared (or been allowed). And it is probably not too much of an exaggeration to say that the Proms themselves would be a different, and a poorer, creature, were it not for the extraordinary stimulus to performers and audiences over the years of the Schools Proms, and the Music for Youth network which lies behind them.

Twenty-one years on, it even seems something of a chicken-and-egg dilemma to ponder whether the Schools Proms merely reflect the confident diversity and professionalism of British youth music against all odds, or whether, in fact, they are actually a part of its making.

Each year, through the National Festival of Music for Youth, 50,000 young performers are auditioned. Many of those who make it to the Albert Hall are merely representative.

The Oxfordshire County Youth Orchestra, which gave a highly sophisticated performance of Malcolm Arnold's tricky Tam O'Shanter, were an emblem of county youth orchestras the length and breadth of the country, that are the equal — and sometimes rather more than that — in musicianship and flair of many a professional band.

There are the one-offs as well. Purcell may never have been quite so whimsically celebrated this year as by the handbell ringers of the Ballard Lake Preparatory School in Hampshire, a team of white-gloved 11-year-olds pealing out a fanfare with prim precision.

And Dave Brubeck's ferocious recasting of the blues in seven-four time tested the mettle of the four members of Slapstick Bass from the final year of Bradfield College who tackled his Unsquare Dance with a cool to rival that of the Arctic.

Increasingly, though, for better and for worse, musical activity is being concentrated outside schools, in centres such as the excellent Gloucester Academy of Music and Performing Arts, whose highly sentient string ensemble played two movements from Britten's Simple Symphony without a conductor.

And in performing art schools such as the Ysgol Glanaethwy School of Bangor. Founded just five years ago, this teenage troupe has already confounded Bulgaria with its linguistic and dramatic prowess. We heard five Welsh folk songs in a cycle called Blas y Pridd (The Taste of the Soil). Of the earth, earthy, and as compelling as anything I have heard in recent weeks.

Going cuckoo for the Phantom

Haunting the globe: identical Harold Prince productions of Lloyd Webber's The Phantom of the Opera can be seen around the world

Jeremy Kingston visits the all-but-permanent home for Lloyd Webber musicals in Switzerland

In Switzerland you will find the highest European mountain, lots of chocolate, cuckoos (or at least cuckoo clocks) and the Reichenbach Falls, where Sherlock Holmes pitted his strength against Professor Moriarty. What hitherto could not be found was a theatre capable of becoming the all-but-permanent home to the musicals of Sir Andrew Lloyd Webber. This void has now been filled with the gutting of Exhibition Hall 107 in the conference centre of Basle and its conversion into the Musical Theater Messe Basel. And here, at the gala opening of The Phantom of the Opera, once again the great chandelier rose and fell, and Christine's Svengali, the demonic Phantom, punted her across the misty underground lake.

A hundred years ago, when Charley's Aunt was being played everywhere in the world, a famous Punch cartoon showed the Earth circled with a myriad running aunts. To run would be beneath the Phantom's dignity but a contemporary cartoon could aptly show a score of masks skimming like frisbees around the globe. Every one is the same as all the others, like all those bonneted aunts, because each production is directed by Harold Prince.

Thus it is that in Basle, just as at the Prince of Wales Theatre in London, and doubtless in Tokyo, Sydney and San Francisco, the proscenium arch is encrusted with the tangled limbs of colossal golden nymphs. In the rehearsal of Hannibal an elephant lifts up its head at the same point in the score, and when it is wheeled round to make its exit, one of the stage-hands inside its belly is always passing a beer bottle to his colleague.

For the Basle opening a planeload of journalists and functionaries from the Really Useful Company flew there in a Saab 50-seater known as a Concordino. But not just any old Concordino: this one had been repainted black and white, with that ghostly mask gazing from the tail-fin, and the splintered letters of the show's title stretched along the sides. The flight took us across central Paris; the Eiffel Tower stuck up through the mist like a black nail: and maybe we flew right over the Opéra, in which case the phantom of the Phantom, if he happened to be on the roof at the time, would have seen his most famous cosmetic accessory skimming above his head.

The building of the Messe Basel is a canny move by the city's councillors. Situated on an elbow of the Rhine where Switzerland rubs frontiers with France and Germany, the city is the focus of an enormous catchment area of businessmen, tourists and folk keen for a glamorous night's entertainment. So close is France that, having cleared customs at the airport, travellers are faced with two signs that will channel them to the country of their choice.

At the afternoon reception in the 16th-century, red-brick Rathaus, Sir Andrew was welcomed by local dignitaries and presented with discs of precious metal decorated with masks, cats, Argentine beauties and other relevant emblems. He steered his way deftly past some dotty questions ("Did he consider himself the Mozart of our century?") and, of Gaston Leroux's original novel, he remarked, "It's a great idea but not a great book. It can't make up its mind if it's a melodrama or a romance or just a very good thriller. Frankly, it's a piece of hokum. But it works."

In the evening we trooped across the river to the site of the medieval fairground messe (fair) to discover that, yes, the show works as well as ever. The exterior of the 1950s Exhibition Hall has been left unchanged, except for the sensationally wide, glazed lobby introduced at one end, and the 1,550-seat auditorium, stage and 60 backstage rooms constructed within it. A black, 32m fly tower rises above the roof.

Because the circle is set further back than at the Prince of Wales (built in 1897), where the two circles were deliberately brought closer to the stage than was the custom, the chandelier plummets down more convincingly at the Messe Basel. It still has to fall diagonally, to hit the stage and not 50 people in the stalls, but swoops faster and looks more thrillingly alarming. (When the Queen of Denmark visited the show in London, her bodyguards sprang forward to protect her when the chandelier came down, though I don't know how they expected to achieve this.)

At the banquet that followed in the Festsaal, another chandelier hung over the dance floor, looking like a Close Encounters spaceship in miniature. Shortly before midnight it began tilting and flickering but still had not fallen on the dancers by the time I left. That sort of thing only happens in theatres, but does so regularly these days, in theatres all around the world. In Switzerland, too, from now on.

Clive Davis reports on the efforts of an American foundation to restore C. S. Lewis's house and popular renown

All aboard for the Narnia tour

One of the venerable pubs that C. S. Lewis used to frequent, close to what is now the Oxford ring road, has gone the way of all flesh. No longer a hostelry, it has been transformed into an outpost of that late-20th-century equivalent of the Holy Roman Empire, the McDonald's hamburger chain.

Change and decay in all around I see? Not quite. For at Lewis's house itself, known as the Kilns, a more benign American influence is at work. A Californian foundation dedicated to the propagation of Lewis's writings is in the final stages of restoring the building and converting it into an international study centre.

Though far from the Oxford tourist trail, the house attracts hundreds of inquisitive visitors each year, most of them from America, where Lewis's Narnia stories and religious essays seem to enjoy a greater following than in his native land. The international success of Richard Attenborough's film Shadowlands — based on Lewis's courtship of the American divorcee, Joy Grisham — has contributed to the flow of sightseers.

Structural work on the Kilns should be completed by next summer. At the moment the house provides lodgings for Oxford students. Hence the cheerless state of the kitchen and the general air of bohemian untidiness.

Which is not so very different, it seems, from the way things were in Lewis's day, according to those who knew him. He and his brother Warren appear to have paid little attention to housekeeping. Friends talk of a house built with books and held together by cobwebs. Lewis's American-born literary executor, Walter Hooper — a contributor to a BBC1 Bookworm film on the Kilns to be broadcast on Sunday (4.25pm) — recalls that the rooms were always suffused with "that wonderful masculine smell of tobacco and old books".

When it is finally returned to something approaching its original condition, the building will provide accommodation for visiting academics, writers, artists and clergy.

The C. S. Lewis Foundation, a charitable organisation based in Redlands, southern California, is also preparing a series of conferences and services in Oxford and Cambridge to mark Lewis's centenary in 1998. Plans are afoot, too, for a liberal arts college in America, to be named after Lewis. The foundation's president, Stan Mattson, hopes that the first class will be admitted by 2001.

At a less exalted level, devotees continue to make the rounds of Lewis's old haunts in Oxford. Last week the Bookworm crew were filming at the Eagle and Child pub in St Giles, where Lewis, Tolkien and other members of the "Inklings" group met.

The local Lewis Society still holds gatherings there. Its treasurer, Peter Cousin, is a taxi driver who makes himself available to overseas visitors in search of a guided tour.

Cousin himself was converted to the Lewis cause by an American tourist who flagged him down outside Magdalen College and asked to be taken to the Kilns. Neither of them knew how to get there but, during their search, Cousin was treated to a lecture on Lewis, and as a result immersed himself in the titles recommended by his passenger. He still keeps one of the books, a Lewis biography, in his glove compartment, ready for all eventualities.

There is said to be a church in California which has an 8ft stained-glass window depicting Narnia's creator. Kim Gilnatt, a Seattle-based foundation supporter who has worked on the Kilns, has heard of an individual — a teetotaller, to boot — who has built a replica of the snug of The Eagle and Child in his basement.

Is there a risk, then, that the admiration of a superb writer and thinker could turn into bland, commercialised hero-worship? Gilnatt stresses that, once restored, the Kilns will serve a serious, scholarly purpose: "We don't want to make it a big tourist attraction. We want to evoke a sense of C. S. Lewis the man. We're not interested in idolising him. The more you study his books, the more you realise that he's human."

THE TIMES THEATRE CLUB

SINCE it opened last year, Cameron Mackintosh's lavish production of Lionel Bart's classic musical Oliver! has become a West End favourite.

Recently, Jim Dale took over from Jonathan Pryce in the role of Fagin and has been a huge success, playing Dickens's leader of a gang of pickpockets as an engaging rogue, rather than as a sinister villain.

Alongside him, Sally Dexter, as the warm-hearted and tragic Nancy, and Miles Anderson in the role of the evil Bill Sikes have helped to make the show a hit all over again.

Theatre Club members can see the show at the Palladium on November 16, and then meet Dale and other members of the cast at a special reception. Tickets are £20 (normally £30), which includes a glass of wine at the post-show reception. Tel 0171-494 5454 to book

Winners will stay at the Radisson Edwardian Grafton Hotel and also enjoy dinner at the Centre Stage restaurant.

Oliver Letwin on two serious inquiries into the realities behind our constitutional façade

SIMON TOWNSLEY

Short-circuiting the hidden wiring of State: poll tax riots in central London on March 31, 1990 were ostensibly protests against centralisation

Unreason of the State

There is a fine tradition of Englishmen, who — by virtue of their intelligence, scholarly inclinations and aptitude for the abstract — are marked out as natural inhabitants of academe, but who are drawn by the vivacity of their interest in the present and the future towards journalism. Walter Bagehot and, in our own times, Sir Samuel Brittan are noble examples of the type. Simon Jenkins and Peter Hennessy fall into the same category. Hennessy — once a journalist but now a professor — has produced the more detached book, and Jenkins (still a journalist) the more passionate.

Hennessy's first aim is to uncover the "hidden wiring" that makes our constitutional machinery work. He identifies, as the main strands of this wiring, three ostensibly innocuous individuals: the Private Secretary to the Queen, the Principal Private Secretary to the Prime Minister, and the Cabinet Secretary. In the absence of a written constitution, it is — he argues — the holders of these three offices — who (on the basis of appeals to precedent, and with the authority attaching to the three great organs of State which they serve) guide the process of selecting new Prime Ministers and establish the procedures followed by the executive. In so far as we have a constitution, it is (in Hennessy's view) what these individuals invent on the back of an envelope in a crisis.

Having penetrated this mystery, Hennessy sets about answering two parallel questions. Who, under the arrangements currently invented, governs us? And can this mode of government be improved? His conclusions are that virtually the whole weight of governing the country is placed upon the shoulders of the Prime Minister, with only limited support from the Cabinet on the one side and the monarch on the other. He believes that the intolerable strain imposed upon a Prime Minister trying to make policy under such circumstances needs urgently to be reduced, through a rejigging of governmental procedures to reduce ministerial "overload", the establishment of an effective "strategy committee" of senior ministers within the Cabinet, and the further strengthening of parliamentary committees.

Jenkins, by contrast, is not content to examine process. His aim is to reveal what he regards as the catastrophic and systematic centralisation of power in Britain in the 1980s and 1990s — continuing and accelerating, as he claims, a trend established since the war. Wherever Jenkins turns, he finds central government destroying intermediate institutions and replacing them by agencies of Whitehall. He laments what he regards as the new central controls placed on local authorities, the police, the NHS, schools, universities and public housing, as well as the rise of what he describes as unaccountable quangocrats and regulators.

Both of these are good books — seriously meant, well-written and interesting. The contrast between them is that Hennessy is about right; Jenkins is mainly wrong.

ACCOUNTABLE TO NONE
The Tory Nationalisation of Britain
By Simon Jenkins
Hamish Hamilton, £16.99

THE HIDDEN WIRING
Unearthing the British Constitution
By Peter Hennessy
Gollancz, £17.99

Hennessy's identification of certain senior officials as the de facto guardians of the constitution, while a truth long recognised by Whitehall "insiders", is equally long overdue in print. And the suggestion that we need some effective process for strategic decision-making within Cabinet, allied to some effective form of parliamentary check on the executive, must be welcome to anyone who has worked at the centre of Whitehall and seen the deficiencies of the current arrangement.

Jenkins's measured tirade, on the other hand, repeats and reinforces mythology. It is true that central government, since 1979, has removed certain powers and influence from local councillors — notably in relation to schools and police authorities; and it is true also that central government has at least tried to tighten the screws of financial control on local authorities, universities and the NHS. But the notion that this — or the appointment of independent regulators — has somehow reduced "accountability" or vastly centralised power in Britain is wholly misguided.

Authority in Britain has for centuries lain firmly at the centre: every power possessed by local councils has been given them by Parliament in an act of delegation — and this was recognised, for example, when local authorities did the bidding of central government and began abolishing the grammar schools in the 1960s and 1970s; the NHS has always been a National Health Service; the universities have been regulated by Acts of Parliament since time out of mind. Moreover, the newly appointed regulators are in practice more transparent in their actions and less protected by the paraphernalia of large government departments, official secrets and mumbo jumbo than were the ministers — notionally more "accountable" — who previously exercised their powers.

In short, the most that Jenkins could rightly have claimed is that — with the important exception of the privatisation of nationalised industries and the sale of council houses — Conservative administrations have, by their own lights, too frequently missed chances to devolve areas of responsibility directly to individuals making choices in free markets. This is a far cry from the accusation that there has been "massive nationalisation".

There is, however, an even more remarkable feature of Jenkins's book, which it entirely shares with Hennessy's: there is in each case a very large dog that does not bark. Here are two highly intelligent and well-informed commentators, writing about the development of British government in the late 20th century, and neither of them more than mentions in passing the most significant constitutional occurrence of our time — the increasing subordination of UK and other European national institutions of government to the institutions of the European Union.

Reading these books is like sitting in a comforting time-machine, which has the miraculous power of removing the European Council, the Commission and the European Court of Justice almost wholly from the scene, returning us magically to a world continuous with that of Palmerston, Lloyd George and Churchill — a world in which our domestic constitutional arrangements are of the utmost importance. But this is, alas, a fantasy world. Unless there is a great change of direction in the next few years, the books that will be need to be written are not about the actions and powers of government within the sceptred isle, but about the constitution and character of European government.

It is charming, but at the same time terrifying, that writers of the stature of Hennessy and Jenkins should have their eyes so keenly and so nostalgically fixed on a now rapidly vanishing past. If people like this are still thinking in insular terms, what chance has the nation as a whole of comprehending or assessing the vast evolution to which it is being subjected?

The dramatist who made an art form out of plagiarism

Mark Steyn casts doubt on the originality of a pioneer of TV drama

FIGHT & KICK & BITE
The Life and Work of Dennis Potter
By W. Stephen Gilbert
Hodder & Stoughton, £18.99

"Television is the biggest platform and you should fight and kick and bite your way on to it." Thus, in death, Dennis Potter at last comes up with a title of his own. In life, for virtually every entry in his collected works, he preferred to use some other guy's: Follow the Yellow Brick Road, Only Make Believe, Pennies From Heaven, Rain on the Roof, Cream in my Coffee, Lipstick on your Collar... Whatever his gifts as an author, Potter was not one, as W. Stephen Gilbert concedes, for "the buttonholing image". His most memorable contribution to the language came not from his plays but from his snobbish assault on the Birt and Hussey regime at the Beeb: the new boys, he sneered, were "croak-voiced Daleks". It's an insult which in two words manages to distil the strategy of his entire oeuvre: an inoffensive pop culture reference, viciously applied. And how revealing of Potter's utter dependence on the work of others that, even for the cheapest of cheap gibes, the "greatest individual exponent in the medium's history" is forced to co-opt a reliable schedule filler cooked up by some unsung, unBafta-ed BBC hack.

In Potter's work, the great theme of our times, high culture's dismal dependence on pop culture, comes into peculiarly sharp focus. He grew up in the Forest of Dean, a miner's son listening to genteel society dance bands on the Light Programme. One is struck by the quaint mismatch between setting and soundtrack — one which recurs throughout many of his plays. He railed against twee, suburban, "privet hedge" values — recycling that glib, clapped-out cliché until on one Any Questions?, Enoch Powell politely inquired what was so wrong with privet hedges anyway. If only Enoch had been around to serve as script editor, we might have been spared the equally lazy stereotypes — the spiv salesmen, the bluff military men, the pushy Yanks — which disfigure almost all Potter's drama. Like race to black Americans, the obsession with class corroded his vision. Throughout his career, he returned again and again to the "privet hedge" music of his childhood: the absurdly mannered, over-enunciated, hopelessly dated British dance band versions of American songs.

Gambon as Marlow: Potter's alter-ego?

In a Broadway musical, the songs take the specific situation and universalise the emotion. Potter inverted the practice: he took the allegedly universal and showed how it failed to relate to his specifics. According to Gilbert, the breakthrough came four minutes into Pennies from Heaven, when Bob Hoskins's grubby, vulgar Cockney turns to camera and is seen to be miming to Ambrose's recording of The Clouds Will Soon Roll By. "The moment is a true turning-point," he writes. "Television will never be the same again."

Well, it's true television isn't the same as it was in 1978. It's now got trashy talk shows and home shopping networks and the coarse shellsuit triumphalism of the National Lottery. But that's not what Gilbert means. Hedged with guilt at its public service origins, British TV can't boast about what it does 95 per cent of the time, but only about the marginalia. Even Gilbert, as evidence of Potter's immense influence, can't cite anything other than that insurance commercial where the downsized exec does Let's Face The Music And Dance in the men's room. And that surely is harking back to older models, to the buoyant optimism of Hollywood musicals. Potter's thesis is that these songs are delusions; Allied Dunbar's is that, with the right policy, you can breeze through life with the blithe confidence of Fred Astaire. As a lasting legacy, it can't be much consolation to Potter, a ferocious denouncer of the evils of advertising.

Still, at least the biographer's under the influence: in a touching act of hommage, Gilbert has ransacked Tin Pan Alley for his chapter headings. Many are Potteresque songs — Painting The Clouds With Sunshine, It's Only A Paper Moon — but then you get to Chapter 23 and you're pulled up sharp: Someone In A Tree. Hang on. That's not Ambrose or Al Bowlly, but an obscure dirge from Sondheim's kabuki musical, Pacific Overtures. It's hard to think of anything less likely to appeal to Potter's sensibility than a pseudo-opera full of non-catchy tunes.

And the contrast reminds you that Potter, unlike Sondheim, wasn't interested in the possibilities of music in drama. Miming to old records is a gimmick. Like Potter's intrusive narration in Blackeyes, it emphasises the phoniness of the form, and thereby absolves the author from the traditional requirements of drama — creating plausible characters in critical situations. Like any gimmick, it pays diminishing returns.

"What writer," asks Gilbert, "has laid himself quite so bare, quite so unsparingly, quite so often as Dennis Potter?" Quite so. He took the anonymous art of pop songs — so artless an expression of our feelings that we barely think of them as written at all — and used them as fodder for the signed-all-over, artifice-crazed art of his plays.

By Blackeyes, the shrill fracturing of reality and chronology seemed to have no purpose other than to draw attention to the author. But however crass Potter's leering commentary was over Gina Bellman's beautiful breasts, it was, it seems, nothing compared to his crass proprietorial leering off-camera. "He asked me really provocative questions," says Miss Bellman ingenuously, "like, 'What's it like to be an attractive woman in the 1980s?' "

Poor Potter. He told Melvyn Bragg he wrote for the people he grew up with, but it turns out he was mainly writing for that smug metropolitan coterie he affected to despise. "The foresters didn't like his plays very much," his sister tells Gilbert. "They didn't understand them. We didn't either." Though the book paints the Forest of Dean as remote and isolated, the arrival of the Forest Tandoori and Coleford Movie Mart suggests it has surrendered to that same mass culture Potter loathed.

But as Gilbert's tale proceeds and long-forgotten spats are resurrected about what BBC internal memo Executive Penpusher Tweedledee sent to Corporate Timeserver Tweedledum, a sense of a remote, isolated community does begin to emerge: the old cosy club of British television. Potter's innovations had been taken for granted for decades in theatre and motion pictures. Characters directly addressing the audience? Tennessee Williams did that in The Glass Menagerie (1945), and Bob Hope in The Road to Utopia, and... but how far back do you want to go? Only in television could Potter seem like a radical. In The Singing Detective, the protagonist's psoriasis prompts I've Got You Under My Skin. Clever, but not as clever as the song.

As with the soundtrack credits on a Potter serial, the acknowledgements and appendices of Gilbert's book tell the real story. It's a surprise to discover in the preface that he's been denied permission to quote from the author's works. After all, a guy whose career was built on liberal quotation is in no posirion to insist on the inviolability of his own catalogue. Had the Cole Porter, Jerome Kern and Frank Loesser estates been similarly protective of their copyrights, there wouldn't be much left of Pennies from Heaven. Read Potter's novelisation of the story: without the songs, there's nothing left but a rackety plot full of holes and terrible dialogue. Unlike Irving Berlin, once the song's ended, very little lingers on.

Pure music: the vehicle of the sublime

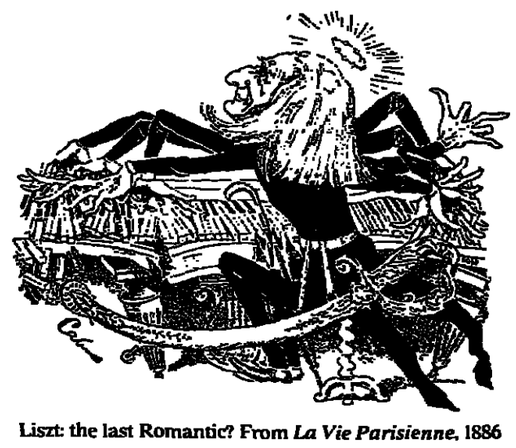

Cyril Ehrlich

THE ROMANTIC GENERATION
By Charles Rosen
HarperCollins, £30 including CD

The title could mislead, for The Romantic Generation is neither textbook nor glib survey. Its 700-odd pages of text and musical examples avoid any attempt to be comprehensive or judiciously selective: familiar compositions and banal ideas go missing, or get short shrift. There's little Berlioz or early Verdi, and no French or Industrial Revolutions. Even Weber appears as composer, not of the quintessentially romantic opera Der Freischütz, but of some unremarkable songs and piano music. Nor is there much concern for history, except for the odd gesture. Thus public concerts are said to have emancipated music from court and church — without indicating when, where, to what extent, or why — making "pure instrumental music the explicit vehicle of the sublime".

Despite accompanying blurbs, this is not a comparable achievement to Rosen's superb, closely argued, The Classical Style, though the manner is similarly magisterial. Building upon lectures given at Harvard, he still disdains fashionable equivocation about the canon. Omniscient, and generally de haut en bas, he simply knows what music is exemplary, and sets about demonstrating its excellence, with three big selections and a confident opening pronouncement. His unique command of practical musicianship, scholarship and verbal facility provides a rare opportunity for those who are not content with disc jockeys to ponder how music is to be comprehended.

To begin, Romanticism gives primacy to sound. For classical composers up to Beethoven music was essentially a matter of shape: Adam Smith is quoted on its rewards to the intellect, "not unlike the contemplation of a great system in any other science". Then the Romantics started composing "directly within the sonority as a sculptor works directly in clay or marble". Their concern for texture, tone, colour and resonance "permanently enlarged the role of sound" and overturned its relationship to structure. Their preoccupation with "Fragments" and "Mountains" leads Rosen into virtuoso flights of erudition and insight, from Schlegel's aphorisms to Beethoven. Schubert's and Schumann's song-cycles, and the latter's piano works. In such masterpieces as Schubert's Winterreise and Schumann's Phantasie, natural unities were created out of small things and a "network of references". Through landscape, "music joins Romantic art and literature" in the elevation of song to cycle, "the most original musical form created in the first half of the 19th century". And so the aperçus continue to illuminate and provoke: on music's use of quotation and the "distant echoing sound that stands for memory"; on Schumann's ironic employment of the banal; on the need to suspend distaste in order to understand Liszt's genius.

Liszt: the last Romantic? From La Vie Parisienne, 1886

Rosen is primarily an articulate pianist, like Schnabel, Gould and Brendel, but significantly different in technique and favoured repertoire. Glenn Gould, the Canadian guru of Bach, for example, notoriously despised Chopin, while Rosen plays both, and perceives links between them so fundamental as to inspire the book's next major theme. The idea is familiar, but has rarely been pursued in such detail and with such ability to inform non-musicians. Technical analysis and nonchalant keyboard virtuosity — utilised here on an illustrative compact disc — are matched by verbal clarity and precision.

Chopin's A flat Ballade is described as sustaining an "impression of absolute continuity, a closely knit web of kaleidoscopically changing harmony. We are not always aware of all of these different voices at once, but if one of them becomes the bearer of harmonic significance, we hear instantly where it has come from and where it is going." The Mazurkas, analysed in depth, are glossed in a phrase: "the combination of rigour and freedom, of rustic dance and sophisticated art which is [their] glory". If simple, exactly focused words about music are always welcome, their role throughout this book is crucial: to provide life-lines for those potential readers who want to take music seriously, but cannot read its language.

Since the basic procedure is to put each piece under the microscope, explaining its structure, and seizing upon points of detail to illuminate its beauty, an ideal reader, seated at the piano, would play the notes, engaging arguments directly by hand, mind and ear. Others must rely upon the CD and wider listening, but they may also respond to the stimulus of fertile verbal imagery, along with adroitly placed "sit up and listen" squibs. Assured, for example, that "above all, Chopin was the greatest master of counterpoint since Mozart" (so much for Gould), they will not understand through the fingers, but may still proceed beyond images of "an imaginative genius seriously limited by a deficient technique". To comprehend the genius, Rosen insists, one must start with the craft, but technical analysis never lacks verbal assistance. Chopin achieved both "a rich chromatic web of polyphony, based on a profound experience of J.S. Bach", and "a way of sustaining the melodic line derived directly from Italian opera". It is only a seeming paradox, and the perfect synthesis is illustrated by a Chopin Prelude and an aria from Bellini's Norma.

Later chapters, until a final return to Schumann, hang too loose for summary. There is more praise for Bellini, and even Meyerbeer; a note on the "romantic grotesque, central to Schumann and Berlioz", an unkindly titled, yet balanced chapter on "Mendelssohn and the Invention of Religious Kitsch". Musicians will dip, play and argue for years to come: but how will others read, and with what kind of understanding? Will it be sufficient that awell-marketed package can find a niche alongside those books on science which also try to cross frontiers of language?

Woodrow Wyatt on a grande dame with claws

Cynthia Gladwyn (then Lady Jebb) in 1953 at the United Nations, where her husband was Britain's representative

THE DIARIES OF CYNTHIA GLADWYN
Edited by Miles Jebb
Constable, £20

Cynthia Gladwyn died five years ago. For more than 60 years she was married to Gladwyn Jebb, now Lord Gladwyn, who was Ambassador to the UN and France in the 1950s. I thought of her as Lady Pitter-Patter or Chitter-Chatter. I met her fairly often when she was aged around the mid-sixties. She knew the art of staying lively and pretty through lavish application of cosmetics and clearly enjoyed being a centre of attention. She also had a remarkable visual memory. I would have been amazed had I known that this delicate little creature was keeping robust diaries studded with sharp observations and roguish judgments. Spanning the years from 1946 to 1972, these diaries should be on everyone's bookshelves. They are mischievous, often unkind and, above all, gloriously snobbish.

She had a great friend, Ava, widow of a diplomat who in 1941 married Sir John Anderson, later Lord Waverley. The first of many references to Ava reads: "Sir John Anderson came in after tea: a kind sensible man with a paunch. They seemed devoted to each other, but I think he is shrewd enough to see through her."

British Embassy, Paris, April 25, 1959: "Here is a saga worth recalling. It proves, had anybody doubted it, how vain Anthony Eden is, and how difficult Clarissa is." The saga was trying to ward off a proposed stay by the Edens until after the Queen Mother's visit and other uncancellable arrangements. "I thought I had persuaded him but at this point Clarissa removed the receiver from Anthony's hand and was as rude as only a red-haired person can be. She said . . . Anthony could always have his food on a tray if he couldn't attend our lunches and dinners, and ended up by saying they would go to a hotel and rang off abruptly."

Gladwyn wrote to Anthony that "if they came Thursday or Friday they would find Rab here". Ex-Prime Minister Eden was infuriated that Rab, then Leader of the House and Home Secretary, could stay and they not. He raised hell with the Cabinet Secretary, but after much elaborate planning by the embassy, feathers were smoothed and the Edens did stay in a hotel.

The trials of ambassadors in captivating capitals, entertaining those who feel their status entitles them to it, are nightmarish. However, one charming visitor on February 17, 1957, Maurice Edelman, "told us something of great interest". Guy Mollet, the French Prime Minister, had just informed him that the whole idea of the French collaboration with Israel and Britain to invade Egypt to squash Nasser, while pretending it was to put a buffer between Israelis and Egyptians, was his. This heralded the end of Eden's unhappy premiership, and the beginning of Macmillan's.

The diary entry for January 18, 1957, is fascinating. "Harold made a tremendous speech yesterday, full of pep, saying we were a great power, that everybody must work hard, that it was ridiculous to say we were finished. He is quite right to take this line, but it is further proof of the sickening hypocrisy of politicians. Only a few weeks ago, in this very Salon Vert, he was giving us a long tirade on how the European civilisation had come to an end, that England was finished, that Western man's day was over and Eastern man's day was dawning, that he had tried (via the Suez attack) to save the situation for the sake of his grandchildren (a great deal is made of these grandchildren, I notice), but all to no avail, because the white man is doomed."

After Macmillan had ceased enthusiastically to preside over our decline, the diarist meets him on May 12, 1964. "Harold was much changed, was physically and mentally slower, and more than ever in an Edwardian dream, harping back to the golden age before the First War. When I praised him on a recent speech he had made (how one flatters people at dinner parties! It is quite despicable — partly good manners, partly that weakness 'the desire to please', partly to help out), he said that he had suddenly felt tired halfway through . . . He is terrified of women, though he covers it up by kind remarks and inquiries that surely deceive nobody."

The diaries are spattered with gems. Sir Thomas Beecham "began talking of the George Moore letters to Emerald [Cunard], and evidently did not agree with the idea that their friendship had in fact been a love affair: 'I always understood that George Moore was a case of didn't kiss but told'." Horace Seymour "used to be known in the Diplomatic Service as Silent Seymour. Once an important foreign lady sitting next to him at a dinner party asked him in exasperation if he ever spoke at dinner: 'Never', he replied." March 14, 1947: Harold Nicolson "has just joined the Labour Party, and I really wonder whether he is an asset to them . . . Can Harold be after a peerage now?" He was, but Attlee wouldn't give him one.

I had a connection with the diarist which we sometimes discussed. She was descended from Isambard Kingdom Brunel, who did the engineering of that masterpiece of railway stations, Paddington, and Sir Matthew Digby Wyatt designed the architectural decorations. Travellers by train from Paddington who took these entertaining diaries with them would find the pleasure of their journey much enhanced. She describes her friend Ava Waverley as "Becky Sharp personified". How about you, dear Cynthia?

Did he do any good?

BALKAN ODYSSEY
By David Owen
Gollancz, £20

Reading David Owen's account of his engagement with the war in former Yugoslavia is heavy going, even for those most closely involved with the question. Not surprisingly, most readers pause with gratitude at the pictures. One of them, rather sportingly, shows the cover from Private Eye which greeted the announcement in August 1992 that Lord Owen was going to be co-chairman of the International Commission on the Former Yugoslavia. John Major grasps David Owen's hands, saying: "I'm afraid it's a hopeless cause." Owen, beaming at the camera, replies: "I'm your man." Then as now, Private Eye demonstrated a better grasp of the Bosnian war than some British broadsheets. After reading Balkan Odyssey, my only quibble with this judgment is that the cause was rendered even more hopeless by Owen's handling of it.

The book will disappoint anyone hoping for some sort of insight into the nature and causes of the Bosnian war. This is a personal odyssey; Owen's ceaseless battle with manipulative Bosnian Muslims who disobligingly insist on putting up a fight against their annihilation, emotional journalists who cannot be induced to see beyond the latest bout of ethnic cleansing and, above all, an American Administration which refused to enforce the Vance-Owen peace plan, by putting troops on the ground. Cyrus Vance and David Owen produced a plan to divide Bosnia-Herzegovina into ethnic cantons in 1993: it was rejected by the Bosnian Serbs. The bitterness that this engendered in Owen is understandable, but it distorts his account of everything else.

Owen is neither a bad nor an uncaring man: his original view in 1992 of the war as "a moral issue . . . tales of death and brutality make it no exaggeration to warn of a holocaust . . ." was animated by real indignation at the systematic murder and dispossession known as ethnic cleansing. But practi*cally none of this emerges in* this book. It is not difficult to see why. To take up the position of EU peacemaker in Bosnia on terms framed by the British and French Governments was to abandon at the start any attempt to distinguish between the nature of the parties in the war.

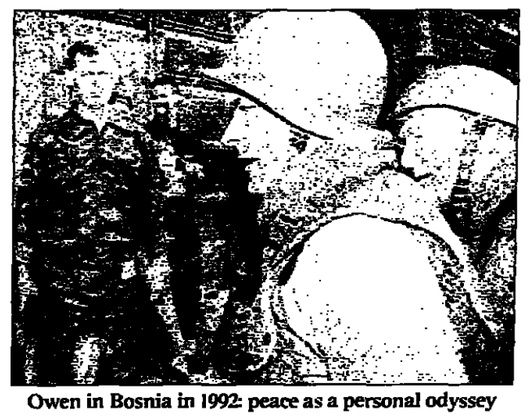

The Bosnian Government, for all its corruption and weakness, has tried to preserve a reasonably pluralistic state; whereas the Bosnian Serb forces, backed by the Serbian government, were fighting to establish and preserve an ethnically cleansed state. There was and remains a radical difference between the war aims and the legitimacy of the two sides. But if you sole objective is to "contain" the fighting, of course you do not dwell on the fact that systematic ethnic cleansing was the aim of the Belgrade-backed Serbs, not an incidental by-product of the fighting.

And certainly you do not talk about the historic nature of the borders that have been forcibly changed in the war.

Owen is correct to say that the peace plans that followed the collapse of his own were dishonourable. But this is not sufficient to vindicate the Vance-Owen plan. There is a strong case for the view that its "cantonisation" of Bosnia on ethnic lines was a contributory factor in the outbreak of the subsequent Croat-Muslim war, after the Croats realised that the cantons would have left the Bosnian Serbs in possession of 43 per cent of the country.

Much of his scorn is reserved for those who wanted the arms embargo on the Bosnian Army lifted and he rehearses the argument that to have done so would have been prejudicial to the humanitarian effort. It should at least be pointed out that if the Bosnian Army had been equipped to defend its population against dispossession there would have been far less of a need for humanitarian aid to begin with. And talk of deploying US ground troops is a little rich when the Bosnian Army actually had 200,000 men on the ground, and wanted only to equip them.

The British ministers responsible for our Balkan policy will find this self-exculpation immensely gratifying. The book would be damaging to a real understanding of the war if there were any likelihood that anyone else will manage to read it.

DON'T CALL IT NIGHT
By Amos Oz
Chatto & Windus, £14.99

MY MICHAEL was the novel which first put Amos Oz on the international map. It is a subtle novel with many shades of grey, a novel where the writing is so fine that the very lack of pace in the storytelling lends it half its atmosphere.

Since then, Oz has written 15 more books; this is his tenth novel. Most of the others, though successful, were less enchanting than My Michael. Much of Oz's reputation came to be built on his writing about Israel, commenting on the political and cultural situation in his country with his characteristic sensitive writing, and, some of the time, with a great deal of controlled anger. Indeed, his volume In the Land of Israel, describing how politics, daily life and moral thinking felt in Israel, is a minor masterpiece.

But with Don't Call It Night he has tried to return to the style of My Michael. We are back to the wry writing, to the lack of action as part of the plot, to an atmosphere of unsatisfied lust, bitter longing, the sad greying of distinguished men, to disillusion. These are familiar themes for Oz. At first the reader is lured into thinking that it will really work, will really captivate. For the plot is brilliant — about a child who dies, probably as a result of drugs, failed by his school, friends, and family, with a father away in Africa. Then one of his teachers, Noa, heroine of the novel, resolves to set up a detoxification centre in their small town. But she is frustrated by a Nimby-like reaction: even the otherwise brave mayor has doubts, as does Theo, her once-idealistic, now cynical long-term lover. Noa herself comes to doubt her own ability to deliver.

But the magic of the telling somehow fails halfway through. We never quite discover why Noa becomes disillusioned. We do not understand her complicated relationship with Theo. The boy's father, despite appearing, never materialises as a character. The end of the novel has a so-what-ish feel to it, as if resolution were possible, but Oz wanted us to feel dissatisfied. Yet the lack of satisfaction is not wholly because of what took place, but because we are not provided with sufficient clarity in the telling of the tale.

Amos Oz: bitter longing

The decision to go back to his earlier style was a brave one, and to be welcomed. Oz can convey better than any other writer the atmosphere of small-town Israel — the population mix, the voices, the smells, the warring factions. He knows it intimately. It comes from the pores of his skin, from under his fingernails. But this time it is too restrained, too withdrawn. And the reader is left bewildered, longing for another Amos Oz novel, perhaps with the same basic plot, but more explicit, more resolved, more passionate about the way adults fail children repeatedly, despite all their greater experience — in Britain as much as in Israel.

Struggling Smith faces slow-bowling trial in final warm-up game

England turn thoughts to first Test

FROM ALAN LEE
CRICKET CORRESPONDENT
IN KIMBERLEY

IT BEGINS a week today, and it has attracted the sort of pre-publicity usually reserved for the more bloodthirsty films. England's Test series in South Africa, it has repeatedly been said, will be a platform for speed and hostility, in which there will be no place for the subtleties of spin. Yesterday, however, the tour management began to question the dogma and to review its strategy.

Suddenly, even the opening Test match at Centurion Park in Pretoria, supposedly a fast bowler's paradise to set the tone for the series, is offering fresh possibilities. A provincial first-class match was won there, on Tuesday, by Paul Adams, a novice left-arm wrist spinner from Western Province. It was the second consecutive pitch there to crumble accommodatingly for the slow bowlers, and although Hilbert Smith, the groundsman, continues to assert that the Test surface will be dissimilar, Eric Simons, the captain of Western Province, said that he "cannot see how it can be much different".

It did not take long for this to encourage the England party. "If we think the Test pitch will turn next week, I would have no hesitation in picking both our spinners," Michael Atherton, the captain, said. "They are not just here for the ride." Raymond Illingworth, the manager, concurs. "We are not going there with a closed mind," he said.

Such a shift of emphasis would not suit the South Africans. Their strength is pace. Put another way, their weakness is spin. The token slow bowler in their 12 came down to a choice between Clive Eksteen and Pat Symcox. Neither is an attacking weapon and, as Symcox has just been dropped by his province, Natal, Eksteen won an unenthusiastic vote.

Further evidence of the paucity of spin arises in the inclusion in the South Africa A team, to play England at Kimberley Country Club starting today, of the bowler who took those six wickets at Centurion Park. Adams is 18, was making his senior debut, and found himself elevated to national selection even before his match-winning spell.

Adams, a graduate of the academy supervised by Eddie Barlow, has an action that has been likened to a "frog in a blender", and his hasty promotion says much about the shallow resources beneath the Test squad. The son of a Cape Town fisherman, he professes himself astounded to be playing against England, for whom the downside is that Adams, should his nerve hold, may give Robin Smith's Test audition a tormenting twist.

Smith's return to his native land has not, thus far, run to script. Smith is desperate to succeed here and England are giving him every opportunity to do so, but failure in this game would see his Test place sacrificed to John Crawley, and almost the last thing Smith would wish to confront is a mystery spin bowler.

He was in good form in the nets yesterday. It was an intense session and, to witness Atherton and Angus Fraser snarling and goading each other, one would not have guessed that they are close friends.

Come the afternoon, a mellower Fraser strolled with his camera around the latest wonder of South African cricket, a new ground here in the township of Galashewe. It is the twelfth such venue to be opened under the development programme pioneered by Ali Bacher, and perhaps the most appropriate. As Bacher recalled yesterday, it was the people of Galashewe who disrupted the first match of the final, ill-conceived "rebel" tour, led by Mike Gatting.

"I never again want to experience such anger and hostility," Bacher, the chief executive of the United Cricket Board of South Africa, said. "and yet what happened here was not only the beginning of the end for that tour, it was the start of something far more fulfilling."

As ever, Devon Malcolm was the talisman for the township boys, a role that causes him modest delight. Malcolm is no longer a moping outsider of the party and, for two days here, he has bowled extremely fast in the nets. Illingworth may claim the credit for this, but the mediating role of Atherton merits greater praise.

Atherton is so taken by the mood and the form of his party that he was tempted to say: "It is the best start to any tour I have been on." This is dangerous talk, and he knows it. "Sometimes, you can be fooled by the early weeks," he said. A week from now, in a Test for which the portents are now concerning the South Africans more than the English, we shall know just who has been fooled.

Taylor believes series will be trouble-free

FROM MICHAEL HENDERSON IN BRISBANE

THE first Test match between Australia and Pakistan, which begins here today, could hardly be more interesting, or important. For the past year the countries have snarled insults at each other like spurned lovers. Now they have to make up, if only in public, otherwise they may evaporate in a froth of indignation.

Even without the noises off, which emanate from the Salim Malik affair, this Test, the first of three, would be one to savour. On form, Australia are the best team in the world, immensely strong in batting and bowling. Pakistan, a brittle side of brilliant players, must bounce back from defeat last month at home by Sri Lanka, who won where, last year, Australia could not.

Mark Taylor, whose captaincy of Australia began with a pair at Karachi in the Test where Salim allegedly offered money to Tim May and Shane Warne to throw the game, has come a long way since then. He is confident that his relationship with Wasim Akram, recently reappointed as Pakistan captain, can extend throughout the two sides, and the series can pass off peacefully.

"I established a good rapport when the Pakistanis were here last time [1989-90]. He bowled magnificently and I had one of my better series with the bat, so I think we have always had a mutual respect. We have always got on and I believe this will continue." If it does not, then it is up to Raman Subba Row, the International Cricket Council match referee on duty here, to read the riot act.

The game will be played on what should be an outstanding Test pitch. It looks green and has absorbed a lot of rain in the past week, but under the unforgiving Brisbane sun it is drying fast. Warne described it as the best cricket pitch in Australia, one that will assist the quicker bowlers early on, flatten out to befriend the batsmen and finally offer spinners the chance to tweak the ball.

Last year in Pakistan Warne took 18 wickets and Malik, who saved the Rawalpindi Test with a double century, contributed 557 runs. Within the team context, theirs will again be a battle of particular interest, and Taylor has no intention of using his match-winning leg spinner as a stock bowler. "He is a strike bowler," the captain said, "and should be used like that. There's no point in bringing him on to keep an end tight."

Taylor is looking for "a continuation of what we did in the West Indies earlier this year", when his pace bowlers held the home batsmen in a vice-like grip during a memorable 2-1 triumph. Here there should be sufficient bounce and pace in the pitch for McGrath and McDermott to provide a severe examination.

Waqar Younis certainly plays, having convinced Wasim at a final net session that his hip injury will stand up to a five-day Test (six, if you include the rest day, a rare thing nowadays). It ought to be a terrific match.

Chris Cairns and Dion Nash, the New Zealand fast bowlers, took three wickets for eight runs to jolt India on a rain-interrupted first day of the third Test match in Cuttack yesterday. Cairns struck twice, removing Sachin Tendulkar for two, as India slumped from 69 without loss to 77 for three in the morning. India moved to 120 for three at the close.

McGrath's resolution impresses Emburey

BY OUR SPORTS STAFF

ENGLAND A maintained the winning start to their tour of Pakistan with a comfortable six-wicket victory over a Combined XI in Karachi yesterday. They sealed their third successive triumph just before tea on the final day of the four-day match. Nick Knight, the opener who played in two Test matches against West Indies this summer, steered England to their victory target of 116 with an undefeated 71.

He received solid support from the Yorkshire batsman, Anthony McGrath, who shared in an unbroken fifth-wicket stand of 60. They repaired the damage after a batting collapse had seen England tumble to 18 for three — Pooley, Ostler and Piper all falling cheaply.

John Emburey, the England A manager, said: "I'm very pleased with the result. Every match is an experiment. This is what a tour of India or Pakistan is all about, pressure, spinning wickets, very slow wickets. I'm particularly impressed with the character of McGrath. He's only 19 and was playing with a tummy upset."

Earlier, the Combined XI batted for 50 minutes, with Taufiq lending support to Ramzan, and staying at the wicket for 83 minutes to score five runs. Ramzan carried his bat for an accomplished 121, displaying fine concentraiton to stay in on difficult pitch for 375 minutes, facing 259 balls.

England A now move on to Lahore, where they play two games before the start of the first international match in Multan on November 17. Craig White, who injured a hand on the first day of the tour, will be playing on Friday when England A play an additional practice match.

He needs to produce an impressive display because Ronnie Irani has staked a strong claim for the all-rounder's spot in the team for the international. He proved the leading light on the third day with an impressive spell of medium-pace bowling which earned him five for 19.

Richard Evans sifts the form book for ten horses to follow this jumps season

Herbert Lodge can build on debut promise

CAMITROV: This French-bred gelding joined Simon Christian last year as a four-year-old after placed efforts over fences in France and quickly acclimatised. He won three times, including a good race at Punchestown, and finished third to Klairon Davis in the Arkle. He is a particularly adept jumper of fences, who looks fairly handicapped and is bred to get three miles. The First National Bank Gold Cup at Ascot on Saturday week has been pencilled in for his reappearance and he is capable of winning a decent handicap chase or two.

DUBLIN FLYER: Tim Forster's bold-jumping front-runner has improved with virtually every race since his chasing career began in October 1992. Now nine, he recorded his best performance at Aintree in April when defying top weight of 12 stone to win the John Hughes Memorial Trophy by nine lengths. That success suggested he possesses the qualities required to win the Grand National, a race his trainer has won with Well To Do, Ben Nevis and Last Suspect. Dublin Flyer, who makes his reappearance in the Mackeson Gold Cup at Cheltenham on Saturday, is yet to race on fast ground and is arguably best with a decent break in between races.

HAWKER HUNTER: This is the dark horse in my list who could cause a few surprises when he goes novice hurdling. A winner of a Newmarket maiden as a two-year-old before finishing fourth in the Royal Lodge, he was well regarded by Paul Cole but slightly lost his way as a three-year-old. Now with Charlie Egerton, he has been gelded and at last has the strength to match his ample frame. In due course he will need a trip, but he has shown sufficient speed and hurdling ability at home to suggest he can make up for lost time over two miles.

HERBERT LODGE: If asked to nominate just one horse to follow this term, it would be this highly regarded Montelimar gelding. Described by Kim Bailey as a "gem", he was second to Berude Not To in a grade two race at Cheltenham on his only start over hurdles last season. He was never quite right afterwards and connections wisely decided to give him plenty of time off and keep him a novice for this term. The six-year-old should repay that patience handsomely and is due to run in about three weeks' time.

HILL OF TULLOW: Won four races over hurdles in Ireland last season before joining David Nicholson's yard in April. A smashing looking horse, he was purchased with the idea of winning the Sun Alliance Chase at Cheltenham and the way in which he made a successful debut over fences at Chepstow last Saturday suggests that is not an impossible dream. A winner on all types of going, he is just the sort to run up a winning sequence.

LARGE ACTION: Despite making a winning debut over fences at Uttoxeter last week, the runner-up in last season's Champion Hurdle is now likely to revert to the smaller obstacles. With question marks hanging over so many of the principal contenders for the hurdling crown next March, he must have every chance of going one better at Cheltenham. Either way, he is sure to win races, whatever the size of the obstacles.

MERRY GALE: Jim Dreaper's star chaser — still only seven years old — was clear with Master Oats in the Cheltenham Gold Cup with three fences to jump until the unusually soft and testing ground took its toll. He still finished fourth but came into his own on better going at Aintree where he won the Martell Cup in style. That victory suggests he needs to improve by only a few more pounds to be the best chaser around. Provided the ground at Cheltenham this season is not so testing, the Gold Cup trip should be within his compass.

PUTTY ROAD: A substantial cheque saw this Bob Back gelding switch ownership and move from Aidan O'Brien's yard to that of David Nicholson midway through last season. Rarely has a major investment reaped such a quick reward, for the five-year-old won the Sun Alliance Hurdle at Cheltenham in March and promises to do even better this term. The Stayers' Hurdle at the Cheltenham Festival is the main objective and he is particularly effective in the mud.

ROUYAN: This nine-year-old has suffered his fair share of problems down the years which have restricted his racecourse appearances. But as his two victories from two starts last season confirmed, he has bags of talent when he is right, including a high cruising speed and spring-heeled jumping. Jenny Pitman is just the right person to bring out the best in him and when the rain arrives the winning sequence should be extended.

SIMPLE ARITHMETIC: Kim Bailey has a surfeit of novice chasing talent and this seven-year-old is as good as any. An impressive winner at Newbury last season, he went on to finish third in the Sun Alliance Hurdle and runner-up in the Scottish Champion Hurdle. However, there could be better to come over fences and he is potentially top class.

Tote Gold Trophy receives fillip

By Richard Evans
Racing Correspondent

A MUCH needed revamp in the entry conditions and prize-money for the Tote Gold Trophy was announced yesterday in an attempt to restore the "Schweppes" magic to the hurdle race staged at Newbury every February.

The two-mile handicap will be worth a minimum of £100,000, second only to the Champion Hurdle in prize-money, and should help to attract the kind of big fields which graced the race in the 1970s and 1980s — when it was sponsored by Schweppes.

An earlier closing date, additional penalty clauses and a procedure to prevent higher weighted horses from compressing the handicap have been agreed in an attempt to ensure a big entry.

The Tote took over sponsorship of the Newbury race in 1987, when 21 runners lined up, but in recent years the size of the field has reduced noticeably, with only eight horses running in the race won last season by Mysilv.

John Smee, from the British Horseracing Board's race planning department, said: "This is an exciting revamp to a race which was one of the most important ante-post races in the jumps season.

"We believe owners and trainers will jump at the chance to put horses forward for the £100,000 prize-money. Hopefully the number of runners we have seen in the last four or five years will be a thing of the past and there will be a full field of 27 runners. The entry conditions should encourage the better horses to run in the race but also give encouragement to the lesser lights."

Sherwood changes plan

OLIVER SHERWOOD yesterday shelved Large Action's chasing career in order to have another crack at the Champion Hurdle. Labrokes responded to the news by cutting Large Action's price from 6-1 to 9-2 second favourite for the Champion Hurdle, in which he finished five lengths runner-up to Alderbrook last March.

Gold Cup hopes to bypass Newbury

CHELTENHAM Gold Cup hopes Brief Gale and Barton Bank were the most notable defectors at yesterday's forfeit stage for the Hennessy Cognac Gold Cup at Newbury on November 25.

Firm ground has caused last season's Sun Alliance Chase winner Brief Gale — 14-1 for the Gold Cup with William Hill — to be removed from the £85,000 race. "I took her out of the Hennessy as I wouldn't want her to run three and a quarter miles without getting a run into her first," her trainer, Josh Gifford, said.

Barton Bank, winner of the Charlie Hall Chase at Wetherby last month, will not try to defy top weight at Newbury. David Nicholson will send the gelding straight to the King George VI Chase at Kempton on Boxing Day.

Other withdrawals yesterday were Monalee River, James Pigg, Mad Thyme, Run Up The Flag, The Widget Man and Super Malt.

Leeds hope Brolin will spark revival

BY RUSSELL KEMPSON

LEEDS United, heavily beaten by PSV Eindhoven in the Uefa Cup and with only one win in four FA Carling Premiership matches, will attempt to relaunch their faltering season today by signing Tomas Brolin, the Sweden midfield player. Brolin, 25, passed a medical examination at Elland Road yesterday and returned to Sweden to consider the move.

"I'm very confident that Tomas will join us," Bill Fotherby, the Leeds managing director, said. "We still have one or two loose ends to tie up, but we believe he wants to come here and we hope he will sign."

Arsenal are also hopeful, although less openly, of concluding a deal for Paul Ince, the former Manchester United midfield player who joined Internazionale during the summer for £7.5 million. Reports from Milan yesterday suggested that the deal might not go through before the end of the Italian league's one-week transfer "window", which closes at 7pm tonight. Ince would therefore have to remain with Inter until at least the end of the season.

Brolin also plays in Italy, for Parma, but lost his place with the joint leaders of Serie A mainly because of injury. He has already rejected offers from three rival Italian clubs. However, after two days of negotiations with Brolin and his advisers, Leeds believe that they can link him with Tony Yeboah, the Ghana striker, to form a exciting and productive forward line.

Arsenal first moved for Ince, 28, last week, when David Dein, the club's vice-chairman, travelled to Italy to meet Inter officials and offer £6.5 million for the England international. Arsenal renewed their interest when Massimo Moratti, the Inter president, revealed this week that the club may be prepared to allow Ince to leave. It is doubtful, however, that Arsenal or any other British buyer would be able to beat the Italian transfer deadline.

Ince also cast doubt on any possible return to England. "It might be great that clubs like Arsenal are supposed to be interested in buying me," he said. "but I'm an Inter player at the moment and that's the way it is."

Ince, who on Tuesday was left out of the England squad for the international match against Switzerland at Wembley next Wednesday, has found it hard to adapt to life in Italy. He has been much criticised by the Italian football press, with Inter having won just two of their nine Serie A games.

Terry Phelan, the Manchester City and Ireland full back, is likely to join Chelsea today in a deal believed to be worth £1.5 million. Phelan, who cost City a then British record fee for a defender when they bought him from Wimbledon for £2.5 million in August 1992, spoke with Glenn Hoddle, the Chelsea manager, at Stamford Bridge yesterday.

In a week in which English referees have come under criticism, most notably from Joe Kinnear, the Wimbledon manager, and Sam Hammam, the club's managing director, the Football Association has received a glimmer of good news. David Elleray, one of the country's most senior and respected officials, will take charge of the world club championship match between Ajax, of Holland, and Gremio, of Brazil, in Tokyo on November 28.

Elleray, 41, a housemaster at Harrow School, is the first English referee to officiate at the game, featuring the champions of Europe and South America, since Pat Partridge in 1976.

England has already been represented at two world finals this year. Dermot Gallagher refereed the World Youth Cup final in Oman, while Martin Bodenham took the World Student Games final in Japan. Ken Ridden, the director of refereeing at the FA said: "We might have had a bit of stick recently but I think the appointment of David and the others shows that we can't be all that bad."

Elleray, one of the elite 19 referees in the FA Carling Premiership, has also officiated at three European matches this season. "I think the reputation of English referees abroad is higher than it has ever been," he said. "It is generally felt that English referees are incorruptible, totally fair and honest. We command respect wherever we go."

Godfrey still haunted by Cup memory

Russell Kempson meets a coach with a wealth of top-level playing experience trying to help a non-league club progress in the FA Cup

Brian Godfrey half expected the news but it still hurt. He had helped Preston North End into the last four of the 1963-64 FA Cup, scoring the winning goal in the 2-1 quarter-final win over Oxford United, but was deemed surplus to requirements. Alec Ashworth had recovered from injury and was in; Godfrey, an inside forward, was out.

Preston beat Swansea City 2-1 at Villa Park, prompting Jimmy Milne, the then manager, to reconfirm Godfrey's non-participation in the final, which Preston lost 3-2 to West Ham United at Wembley. As twelfth man again — it was the year before substitutes were introduced — the thrill of the occasion was diluted by omnipresent frustration.

"I was a bit peeved at the time," Godfrey, now 54, said. "It wasn't a nice feeling. I might have been on the bench but there was no way back. The boss admitted that he had probably made a mistake, but it was done."

Thirty-one years on, the FA Cup buzz is back, with Cinderford Town. The Beazer Homes League southern division club, from the rugby union bastion of the Forest of Dean, play Bromsgrove Rovers in the first round on Saturday and Godfrey, the Cinderford coach, already senses the anticipation among the players.

"It is a little bit of glory for them, a chance to prove themselves," he said. "If we win this game and one more, we could get Manchester United. FA Cup week is probably the only time when you feel as if you want to play again. There is something about the Cup; it gets to everyone."

Godfrey eventually played at Wembley, for Aston Villa in their 2-0 defeat by Tottenham Hotspur in the 1971 League Cup final, and it helped heal the wound. "I suppose it made up for it," he said. "You never forget walking up the tunnel and hearing all that noise."

He has also played against, and alongside, the very best. He won three caps and scored two goals for Wales, in the era of John Charles and Ivor Allchurch, and joined the North American Soccer League, with Portland Timbers, when the incomparable flames of Pelé and Eusebio were still flickering. Now, an occasional outing for Parkway Honda, in the Gloucester and District Sunday League fourth division, keeps the Cheltenham delivery driver fit and he retains a playing registration with Cinderford. "I've been sub a couple of times this season but not had to come on yet," he said. "I reckon I'm probably good for 20 minutes."

FA CUP

Cinderford, founded in 1922, survives on crowds of 250. It cannot compete with nearby Gloucester City, who possess a wealthy chairman, Keith Gardner, and provide premier division fare, while Lydney and Berry Hill offer alternative entertainment with the oval ball.

"It has always been a big rugby area," Chris Warren, the Cinderford secretary, said. "It is the main sport in most of the schools but I think people are taking more notice of the football. We don't have a big Sugar Daddy like Gloucester but we are a hard-working, family club."

Although Cinderford's rise up the non-league pyramid has been measured rather than spectacular, they clinched the Hellenic League treble of premier division title, premier division cup and floodlit cup last season. It was achieved even though they did not return to The Causeway, their 2,500-capacity ground, until November. They were forced to spend a year in exile as the pitch's 18-foot slope, from corner to corner, was levelled. It cost £75,000, as well as lost income, but guaranteed acceptance into the Beazer Homes. "We fought through and obviously it was worth it in the end," Warren said.

On Saturday, Tim Harris, Cinderford's long-serving manager, and Godfrey, his lieutenant, will plot the downfall of Bromsgrove. "Tim picks the team and I just try to help the players and point them in the right direction," Godfrey said. Tricks learnt when he managed Bath City, Exeter City, Weymouth and Gloucester.

It is Cinderford's seventh match in the competition, including a much-relished 1-0 win over Sugar Daddy's club 12 miles down the road, and takes them another step nearer dreamland, a meeting with Manchester United. When Godfrey, perhaps, will finally erase his haunting twelfth-man memories, get off the bench and play. Just for 20 minutes.

Johansson agrees to stand for Fifa presidency

BY OUR SPORTS STAFF

LENNART JOHANSSON, the president of Uefa, the governing body of European football, has announced that he is to be a candidate for the presidency of Fifa in 1998.

Johansson, who was asked to stand by the Uefa executive committee, does not expect a confrontation with João Havelange, however. Havelange is reported to have told colleagues on the sport's world governing body that he would retire when his term of office expires. "He [Havelange] has officially declared to us that he is stepping down," Johansson said.

Johansson, 66, a Swede who has led a Uefa campaign to curb Havelange's power, said: "I haven't asked, but I have been asked by the members of the committee to stand for election." Asked if he expected to win, Johansson, who became president of Uefa in 1990, said: "I'm not going to campaign. I'm not going to do anything. I've worked in football for 40 years now and people know me. If they like me, they'll vote for me. If they don't, I won't cry."

Although the election is three years away, and although it is still possible that Havelange, 79, a Brazilian lawyer who has held the position since replacing Sir Stanley Rous in 1974, could stand again, Johansson's move reflected a growing confidence in Uefa and a subtle change in the balance of power in the sport.

Havelange retains the support of Central and South American countries, but Fifa's decision to withdraw the world youth championships from Nigeria this year has cost him support in Africa.

Asia and Oceania remain ostensibly neutral, but are said to welcome Uefa's call for regional confederations to have more power within Fifa.

It was also announced after a five-hour meeting in Geneva that Uefa had rejected proposals for basketball-style "time-outs" in football.

The International Board, world football's law-making body, recently authorised Uefa to experiment with time-outs, which increase the potential for television advertising. Johansson said that Uefa had consulted leading clubs and tried out the system at various levels.

"It has not been accepted by players, not by coaches, not by the public, so all that was left was the financial aspect," Johansson said. "Maybe one day it will come back."

Lumley set to play leading role

PENNY LUMLEY, the world champion, heads a strong entry for the British Land national women's real tennis handicap championship at the Oratory School (Sally Jones writes).

Lumley, now playing off 16, has achieved the best handicap of any woman player but faces a tough task in her group against Emma Wood, a doubles specialist, who looks under-handicapped at 35.

Katrina Allen, the former British Open champion, Fiona Deuchar, of Australia, and Alison Cockcroft are leading lights in the event, while Alison Seymour-Meade is well capable of causing an upset.

Peter Rawlings and his son, Harvey, won the N. W. Brown National Inter-Club doubles title with an impressive 6-2 victory over the Moreton Morrell pairing of David Prophet and Angela Reichardt.

Prophet and Reichardt started strongly, making full use of their home-court advantage, but Harvey Rawlings retrieved superbly and hit a string of spectacular volleyed winners. He was well backed up by his father, who defended the galleries effectively.

Tom Pugh and Philip Edey won the Queen's Club championship with an accomplished 7-3 victory over John Prenn, the former world rackets champion, and Claire Southwell.

Pavin falters over closing holes

COREY PAVIN, the US Open champion, and Steve Elkington, winner of the US PGA title, posted scores of 71 to share the lead after 18 holes of the PGA Grand Slam of Golf at Kauai, Hawaii.

The other two members of the world's most exclusive foursome — Ben Crenshaw and John Daly — scored 72 and 75 respectively in this 36-hole event for winners of the year's major tournaments.

Elkington, who birdied the par-five 18th to catch Pavin, said the uneven pace of the greens troubled him more than the strong wind, which made club selection difficult on the Poipu Bay course measuring 6,957-yards.

"The grass grows a lot here," the Australian said. "The greens had seven hours of growth . . . and I think they got slower as the round went on. I think you have to sort of make an adjustment as you go, to hit them firm; then, I think, you've got to get the tempo right."

Crenshaw, the Masters champion, who joked "you can hear it grow out there", clawed his way back to even par after a run of three bogeys from the third hole had put him three over.

Daly, the Open champion, who opened with two birdies, wasted his glorious start by dropping shots at six holes and managed to score only one further birdie.

Pavin had birdies at the 2nd, 6th and 10th holes in a bogey-free run that put him three shots clear of the rest of the field. But he stumbled over the closing holes, three-putting from 12 feet at the par-three 17th after dropping a shot at the downwind par-four 16th.

"I played pretty solid, all in all," Pavin said. "In fact, I played really well through 15. But I hit a bad approach in [at the 16th] and it cost me. I tried to make up for it on the 17th and I got a little aggressive with my putt."

☐ The American LPGA tour will consist of 39 events next year. Two extra tournaments were announced yesterday, raising total prize-money to £16.8 million.

The new events are the £400,000 Betsy King Classic, to be played from October 10 to 13 in Reading, Pennsylvania, and the £333,000 Sacramento Classic from April 4 to 7 in Lincoln, California.

King, who was born in Reading, will be inducted into the LPGA Hall of Fame during the tournament named in her honour.

The tour will open with the Tournament of Champions from January 11 to 14 in Orlando, Florida.

England spring a surprise

BY NICHOLAS HARLING

ORGANISERS of the Zoetermeer Basketball Classic near Amsterdam were annoyed with their English visitors yesterday. "You have ruined the tournament for us," one of them told Morris Wordsworth, the England head of delegation, after the surprise 87-72 defeat of Holland by England late the night before.

Television programmes, which were expected to screen a final featuring the host nation, had to be hastily rescheduled after England's victory, which took them instead into the final against Lithuania, 103-98 winners over Finland in the other semi-final. "I don't think they were too pleased with us," Wordsworth said as Holland prepared for the anti-climax of a third-place match against the Finns.

England, preparing for the European Championship ties next week against Germany and Portugal, showed great improvement on their recent disappointing displays against Latvia and Estonia. The big difference was in the three-point shooting. Between them, Steve Bucknall, Karl Brown and Andy Gardiner sank eight shots from long range. "That really helped us," Laszlo Nemeth, the England coach, said.

Three early baskets from Bucknall, who was to finish as his side's top scorer with 21 points, helped England into an 11-6 lead.

Pegged back to 16-16, England then scored the next ten points helped by two baskets apiece from the recalled Trevor Gordon and Peter Scantlebury, the captain. Ahead 47-34 at the interval, England made the game safe by scoring the next 13 points, nine of them from Brown, who was taking his tally for the match to 17.

Imposing Parke to meet Jansher

FROM COLIN MCQUILLAN IN NICOSIA

TIME and circumstance have conjured a wonderful, but challenging, opportunity here for Simon Parke, the young Yorkshireman whose promise as a junior squash player was overshadowed until recently by the double-handed exploits of his friend and rival, Peter Marshall.

Elevated to England first-string by Marshall's problems this year with chronic fatigue syndrome, Parke, 23, the fifth-seeded former world junior champion, yesterday produced a 67-minute second-round performance in the world open championship to dismiss Zarak Jahan, of Pakistan, 15-4, 16-17, 15-8, 15-8 that, by any measure of speed, adventure and efficiency, could only be termed manly.

He reached his first World Open quarter-final in seven attempts, moving with powerful authority and applying his racket in the front court with a wrist subtlety and wall exploitation that owed far more to Pakistani elan than to traditional European strengths.

"I was pleased with my start and the finish," Parke said. "But I went a bit flabby in the middle of the match. I lost to Zarak in our last two meetings and I was determined to correct that here before we move on to Cairo for the World Team championship next week."

He will find more pertinent practice for that event in the quarter-finals today, in which he faces the ultimate in Pakistani squash players, Jansher Khan, the defending champion, who yesterday polished off his countryman, Mir Zaman Gul, 15-3, 15-6, 15-7 in 28 minutes in pursuit of a record seventh World Open title.

"I want to break the record of six wins held by Jahangir Khan, but it adds more pressure," Jansher said. "I am trying to finish early matches quicker to save energy."

Parke fully understands the consequences of that philosophy. He defeated the Pakistani master once back in 1991 by catching him early in the Dutch Open championship.

But after a 68-minute final in the US Open last month he said: "Jansher is meaner and tougher in finals. I know how to beat him. You have to be tight and accurate and you have to last a long time. Knowing how is one thing — doing it is another," he acknowledged. "But I have played better in recent tournaments and I will be going for another win against Jansher."

Another opportunity arose later last night when Mark Chaloner, 23, the England fourth string, got to the quarter-finals in his first appearance in a World Open main draw by beating the fourth-seeded Brett Martin, of Australia, 9-15, 15-11, 17-16, 15-13. Scotland's Peter Nicol failed his third-seeded expectations losing 13-15, 17-15, 15-7, 15-8 to Finland's Sami Elopuro.

Amateurs in key role for new era

Hallett calls for urgency on plan to end old order

BY DAVID HANDS, RUGBY CORRESPONDENT

ENGLISH rugby has eight days in which to decide whether to accept root and branch the radical recommendations made by the Rugby Football Union (RFU) commission on open rugby yesterday. If the full committee accepts the proposals — which include restructuring of the union's executive — on November 17, then the planned special general meeting in January becomes a marketing exercise.

The RFU, after eight exhausting weeks, has swept away much of the traditional baggage of the domestic game. Though the existing moratorium on professionalism remains for this season, the commission members want the new structure to be in place by the start of the 1996-97 season: contracts for players, tightened disciplinary procedures and a code of conduct for the new era.

"The report needs to be addressed with a great sense of urgency," Tony Hallett, the RFU secretary who chaired the commission, said. "We hope for a universal endorsement up and down the country." Soundings already taken suggest that the sport at large may be far readier to embrace the new era than seemed the case six months ago.

The commission has recognised the particular requirements of England's leading clubs and proposes to offer the National Clubs Association (NCA) two places on a new 14-man board of management which combines professional administrators with the amateurs who, in effect, will also be guardians of the game's much-cherished ethos. "We have existed very well playing an amateur game supported by amateurs," Hallett said. "Today we have a far greater responsibility and greater fiscal and legal controls need to be exercised.

"The open game requires an enhanced level of professional administration," the commission report says. While the general committee, or council, would continue to meet four times a year, the day-to-day running of the sport in England would be handled far more responsively by a services department at Twickenham which is expected to cost £250,000 a year.

The new department would offer advice to clubs and players, on contractual, tax or insurance matters, and also, in association with the business community, on prospects for young players choosing between a sporting or alternative career. In that respect the RFU welcomed the formation of the Rugby Union Players' Association, the professional body the players are establishing.

Changes to the league structure would mean a ten-club first division, a second and third division of 14 clubs each (thus reducing the NCA to 38 clubs from 40), all of whom would play home-and-away fixtures. Thereafter divisions would consist of 17 clubs, whose players would also be eligible for the county championship — retained, whereas the unloved divisional championship is not.

National league clubs could register up to 50 players, and contract up to 70, though the RFU is firmly against clubs signing players under 18. The existing cup competitions would be largely unaffected but a new intermediate cup would be introduced to help satisfy the general desire for "wall-to-wall" competition.

However, promoted clubs would have to ensure that their facilities matched their enhanced status. The possibility of clubs declining to accept promotion is a real one — as in some of football's lower leagues — and would be dependent upon a realistic assessment of their playing and financial capabilities.

There would be no restrictions on paid club administrators, who would also receive voting powers, while provision would be made for the payment of referees and touch judges at the senior end of the game.

The commission acknowledged the poor quality of much of the game's infrastructure and will seek to establish a development fund to improve club facilities. It hopes to apply to the Sports Council for up to £100 million from the National Lottery.

Samoans win few friends in Scotland

Edinburgh	22
Western Samoa XV	35

BY MARK SOUSTER

ON ARRIVING in Scotland last week, the Western Samoans had been keen to play down their reputation for foul play. However, after his side had defeated Edinburgh in the opening match of their short tour, Bryan Williams, the coach, was left having to defend the use of strong-arm tactics by his team. There were several ugly high tackles, one of which, by Veli Patu, the full back, forced Duncan Macrae, the Edinburgh wing, to leave the field dazed.

Ally Donaldson, the Edinburgh captain, said Patu should have been sent off for the challenge seven minutes from time and that several other Samoan tackles bordered on the illegal.

Williams said: "Our guys see the defensive tackle as an effective form of attack. They launch themselves at the opposition and sometimes the intent looks a lot worse than it actually is." Pat Lam, the captain, said none of his players set out to "take anybody's head off. But our aim is to take the ball and all in tackles, just like in rugby league."

The incidents marred an otherwise enjoyable match. Edinburgh scored one try, the first, through Darren Burns after four minutes. Their other points came from Donaldson, who kicked five penalty goals and a conversion.

The Samoans scored five tries, three by Patu, and one each by Tala Leiasamaivo and Brian Lima.

SCORERS: Edinburgh: Try: Burns. Conversion: Donaldson. Penalty goals: Donaldson (5). Western Samoa XV: Tries: Patu (3), Leiasamaivo, Lima. Conversions: Burnes (3). Penalty goals: Patu. Burnes

Wright, who has been capped 16 times, will miss the international against Western Samoa

Six-week ban for Wright

BY MARK SOUSTER

PETER WRIGHT, the Boroughmuir and Scotland tight-head prop, will miss the international against Western Samoa on November 18 after being suspended for six weeks for swearing at a referee during his club's league match against Gala on October 28.

The punishment, announced yesterday by the Scottish Rugby Union (SRU) after a disciplinary hearing at Murrayfield, means that Wright will not be available for Boroughmuir's last three matches, against Stirling County, Watsonians and Heriot's FP, in the Tennents Premiership. The club, which he captains, leads the first division table by a point, ahead of Melrose and Stirling County.

The severity of the sentence has surprised club officials, who believed the player, capped 16 times, would be suspended for a fortnight.

Bill Hogg, the SRU chief executive, said: "The decision was taken after a full appraisal of the facts, and having heard from the player and the referee. The SRU is committed to ensuring the highest standards of fair play are maintained, and will continue to deal equitably with any player sent off, at whatever level in the game."

Bruce Hay, the Boroughmuir director of rugby, said he believed Wright, 27, had been unfairly treated. "When you consider what other players have got for violence, Peter has been made a scapegoat," he said.

Wright, who has repeatedly flirted with controversy because of his adversarial approach to opponents and officials, said he was "extremely disappointed. It is as if they were looking for someone to make an example of. I have only got myself to blame, though, but I never thought for a minute that I would get as long as six weeks.

"I had hoped for two and thought that would be the absolute maximum. I have not only let myself down but also the club."

Jim Telfer, the chairman of selectors, said he was disappointed that Wright would miss the match against Western Samoa. Paul Burnell, of London Scottish, is likely to be brought in as the front-row replacement.

Torrance hopes to upset Americans

THE 41st World Cup of golf starts today at the palatial Mission Hills club in Shenzhen, 60 miles from Hong Kong, with teams from 31 countries trying to prevent the United States of America winning the trophy for the fourth year in succession.

The Jack Nicklaus-designed course, more than 7,000 yards long, should suit Fred Couples and Davis Love III, the long-hitters who have established American supremacy in the tournament, but Sam Torrance, who partners Andrew Coltart in the Scotland team, hopes to complete a memorable season with victory. "Winning here would be a good way to top the year," he said.

Phillip Price has been called up to partner Mark Mouland for Wales in the absence of Ian Woosnam. England will be represented by Mark Roe and Paul Broadhurst, and Ireland by Darren Clarke and Philip Walton. New Zealand lead the non-British challenge to the Americans, with Frank Nobilo and Michael Campbell fresh from recent victories.

Graf stages recovery

TENNIS: Steffi Graf recovered from a set and a break down to beat the unseeded Amy Frazier 2-6, 6-4, 6-2 in the second round of the Advanta championships in Philadelphia yesterday. Graf won the first two games but lost the next six to drop the first set, and then surrendered another break to fall 2-1 behind in the second. Graf, the top seed and joint world No 1, broke back immediately and secured the set in the tenth game before running away with the deciding set.

☐ Tim Henman, of Great Britain, moved into the quarter-finals of the ATP Challenger tournament in Peking yesterday. The top seed defied wintry conditions to beat Benny Wijaya, of Indonesia, 6-7, 7-5, 6-3.

Coutts secures award

YACHTING: Russell Coutts, the triumphant New Zealand America's Cup skipper, and Isabelle Autissier, the French solo yachtswoman who was leading the BOC Challenge solo round-the-world race last winter until a dismasting led to her rescue deep in the southern ocean, have been named as the IYRU world sailors of the year. Coutts won a gold medal at the 1984 Olympic Games and hopes to represent New Zealand again in the Soling class at the Games next year. The awards were presented by King Harald, of Norway, during a gala dinner in Hamburg last night, at the International Yacht Racing Union Conference.

Hall seeks redress

RUGBY UNION: Cardiff have asked Llanelli to pay compensation to their centre, Mike Hall, after his clash with the Llanelli lock forward, Tony Copsey, in September which left Hall with a fractured cheekbone. Hall, who is self-employed, was advised to stay off work after surgery and missed win bonuses and appearance money from four Cardiff matches. Hall declined to take Copsey to court but is concerned over his loss of earnings and Cardiff are acting on his behalf in the first request of this type in Welsh rugby.

What is the best way to play this suit to make five tricks?

4 A Q 10 6 5 3

If you work it through you will see that if the suit breaks 4-2, you will always lose two tricks (except in the unlikely case of North holding K J bare). You have to hope the suit is 3-3; you lead low towards the AQ10 and finesse the ten or the queen.

It is a guess as to which — finessing the ten succeeds when North has J x x and South K x x, finessing the queen succeeds in the reverse situation. Would it make any difference if this was the suit?

4 A Q 10 9 5 3

Again it is a guess if the suit is 3-3. But now there are some 4-2 breaks which are significant. If North has any doubleton honour, it doesn't matter whether you put in the ten or the queen — either way the defence will take only one trick. But think about the situation when South has the doubleton.

If South has the doubleton king, playing the 10 will force it out. But North's remaining J x x will still score a trick. However, if S holds J x, playing the queen on the first round does restrict the defence to one trick. So when you hold this combination, it is correct to finesse the queen.

Here is the same idea in a different format. You have to play this suit to make four tricks.

A 3 Q 10 9 7 5

You lead the ace and continue with a small one. What should you do when North follows low? (I'm assuming that North is a good player who won't fumble if he has the king).

The correct play is the queen. Again it is a guess if the suit is divided 3-3, but playing the queen gains if the suit is 4-2 with South holding J x. If you play the 10 and it loses to K x, North will still make a trick with the jack. Scholarship-level:

A 3 Q 10 8 7 5

On the ace South plays the nine. How do you continue? It is correct to put in the queen on the second round in case South has J 9 alone; if he has K 9 alone you are always going to lose two tricks. But if you are playing against classy defenders you will find that they play the 9 from K 9 x and not from J 9 x, so they get the better of you on those particular three-three breaks.

Figuring out a running conundrum

BRYANT'S EYE

Forget drug-testing for catching athletics cheats, it could be time to try a bit of "statistics testing".

The intriguing thought that you might be able to check out the validity of a record-breaking performance by statistical analysis is suggested in some newly-published work by two British scientists.

Dr Jonathan Tawn and Michael Robinson, of the department of mathematics and statistics at Lancaster University, have turned a sceptical eye on the 3,000 metres world record set by the Chinese superwoman, Wang Junxia, in Peking in 1993. In a paper in Applied Statistics they take a close look at the record-breaking runs that left the athletics world in a state of disbelief. Wang ran what seemed an incredible time of 8min 6.11sec, slicing 6.08sec off the world record just one day after she had destoyed the previous mark by 10.43sec.

She was tested for drugs and found to be clean, and her colourful coach, Ma Junren, teased the world by hinting that the performances of Wang and her training partners were down to the effects of a diet including turtle blood and caterpillar fungus. The statisticians have analysed the record by plotting it against the fastest times recorded in the past over 3,000 and 1,500 metres. They declare it "inconsistent with past performances" but concede that it falls just within the "ultimate time" possible for a woman.

It is fascinating, but dangerous territory. The prediction of limits to athletic performance has always been a problem — and all too often athletes of genius have come along to trip up the experts. The most famous trainer at the turn of the century was Harry Andrews, coach to world record-breakers. He forecast in 1903: "The man who has made the mile record is W. G. George. His time was 4min 12.75sec, and the probabilty is that this record will never be beaten."

Seventy years on, Professor Ernst Jokl, of Kentucky University, analysed records in a wide range of events in order to predict ultimate limits for human performance. His calculations demonstrated that when Bob Beamon added 55 centimetres to the long jump record at the 1968 Olympics, that leap was 84 years ahead of its time. Good statistics, but bad advice to bet on: Beamon's record was beaten by Mike Powell in 1991.

It is particularly dangerous to make statistical predictions for women's performance. For cultural and historical reasons they have not been competing for long, and so the form book is less reliable. One of the first to try was Professor A. V. Hill, who did much of his work in the 1920s. He concluded that the "inferior performances of the women" resulted from "females' lower capacities for power production". It was a conclusion that was to cause him great trouble. "The now defunct Westminster Gazette said that I had insulted the whole female sex," he wrote in his autobiography, "other papers took it up: and angry strong women came to my laboratory demanding to be tested ... I have often wondered what it is about me that attracts lunatics."

There have always been plenty of experts, particularly in Western society, who have insisted that the "weaker sex" is less suited to sports than men. Women did not get a look in at the Olympic Games until 1928, and more than half a century later the Australian Wimbledon champion, Pat Cash, could dismiss women's tennis as "rubbish and junk that lasts only half an hour".

One area where such attitudes have been overcome with dramatic effect is the marathon. The rise of the big-city marathons, particularly London and New York, with their superstars like Greta Weitz and Ingrid Christiansen, inspired thousands of women to run, and between 1969 and 1986 the women's record improved by more than three quarters of an hour while the men's record improved by less than a minute and a half. Of course, the improvement represents not a physiological change — but a sociological breakthrough.

Alan Storey, a leading British distance coach and now manager of the London Marathon, worked in China for two years as an adviser to the Peoples' Republic of China Athletic Association. He confessed he is baffled by the phenomenal times achieved by the Chinese. He believes that Wang's performances could be more out of line statistically than the Lancaster researchers realise. "Many of the earlier performances, particularly those from the old Eastern bloc which they will have used in plotting their predictions, are extremely suspect," he said. "There is no simple explanation for the Chinese girls in '93. Let's hope their performances are legitimate — but it's a puzzle."

'The beauty is there is always an athletic genius who will come along to prove everything wrong'

The leading athletics statistician, Mel Watman, agreed. "Ma Junren clearly has some ingredient that no one else has," he said. "These performances are astonishing, and many of us were highly sceptical of them. Records these days should, in theory, just be chipped away at — little by little. But the beauty is that there is always some athletic genius who will come along to prove everything wrong. Which is great."

In the past two weeks the names of Wang Junxia and the coach, Ma Junren, have been back in the headlines. This time there is a new runner and new statistics to ponder. Jiang Bo is the latest of Ma's teenage prodigies. In the Urban Games 5,000 metres, in Nanjing, she beat Wang soundly into second place. The new girl set an Asian record, ran 14min 45.9sec and finished seven seconds ahead of the world record-holder, Wang.

But the really incredible statistic is that Jiang has done all this at the age of 16. Now that's clearly a case for a bit of "statistics testing".

The casualty is sanity

A Hard Time to be a Father. Radio 4, 2.00pm.

As well as blinding me with verbal images that nearly had me reaching for my dark glasses, Fay Weldon's anarchical comedy about a hospital casualty unit taught me what couvade means. The phenomenon, apparently, is peculiar to the South Pacific. We men are jolly lucky it has not spread further afield. What happens is that, when a woman is about to give birth, her spouse is treated as if only he is suffering the birth pangs. In the play, it is Robert Glenister's young husband who goes to pieces whenever somebody says "baby". He is not the only exhibit in this gallery of lunacy. Everyone else behaves like the Marx Brothers. I rather think Weldon is trying to tell us something about the NHS.

Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. Radio 4 FM, 10.00am.

This is not a radio version of the Marilyn Monroe film, though Annemarie Zola's vacuous gold-digger does sound uncannily like Monroe's. For his four-episode serial, writer Jeremy Front has gone back to Anita Loos's novel and play on which the 1953 movie, too, was based. After all these years, Loos's champagne still bubbles away merrily, and the witty ripostes have kept their sharpness ("Are you looking for a sugar daddy?" "No, I've got diabetes"). Episode one ends with the blonde Lorelei and the brunette Dorothy (Rebecca Front) heading for a London where, Lorelei is assured, almost everybody speaks English.

Whitaker proves reluctant partner

MICHAEL WHITAKER, who is second in the show jumping world rankings, heads a powerful Great Britain squad of ten competing at the Millstreet international horse show, which starts today in Co Cork (Jenny MacArthur writes).

The highlight of the four-day show — the brainchild of the entrepreneurial Noel C Duggan — is the Volvo World Cup qualifier on Saturday evening.

Only two British riders have gained points towards the final in Geneva next April. Di Lampard, who competes again this weekend with Abbervail Dream, was second in Helsinki and third in Oslo and is lying second in the European League. Michael Whitaker had minor placings at Aarhus, Denmark, and in Amsterdam and is in joint eighteenth place.

Whitaker, reluctantly, is riding Two Step in the qualifier. He had hoped to rest the 12-year-old gelding after the Amsterdam qualifier last weekend but the horse, who has won nearly £200,000 since January, has been named show jumper of the year and will receive his award at Millstreet.

"The show insisted that we bring him," Veronique, Whitaker's wife, said yesterday. "So Michael decided he might as well jump him in the qualifier." For the Irish Derby, which carries prize-money of £10,000, on Sunday, Whitaker will ride George Lindemann's Let's Go. Since starting to ride the Germanbred gelding less than two months ago he has won the Aarhus grand prix and the Monterrey Derby, in Mexico.

John Whitaker, Michael's older brother, is resting his top horse, Grannusch, this week after his $100,000 (about £64,000) win in the Pulsar grand prix at Monterrey last month and has a rare outing on Everest Gammon.

The 17-year-old gelding is more often ridden by Whitaker's daughter, Louise, who is hoping to ride him in the under-18 European championships next year. In order to be eligible for that event the horse must not have jumped in any Nations Cup meetings in the previous year.

"It hasn't done him any harm missing the big events," Whitaker said yesterday. "In fact, he's probably jumping better for it."

Nick Skelton is also resting his leading horse, Dollar Girl, but Everest Showtime is in equally good form. The mare won the San Marino grand prix in September and was tenth in Monterrey.

Michael Whitaker: rides in World Cup qualifier

Cousins to aim for record title tally

BY JOHN HENNESSY

THE British ice skating championships in Basingstoke, from today until Saturday, are the first to be held under a new administration. Members of the National Ice Skating Association, given increased confidentiality in voting procedures, chose emphatically for change and many well-known faces have already disappeared from the scene.

Some even better-known figures have had their wings clipped, notably Courtney Jones, who has yielded the presidency to Sally Stapleford.

With the old guard out of the way, the administration now carries a much less dated look under Stapleford and, with a dynamic new chief executive in Celia Godsall, there are hopes that, in time, British ice skating may be hauled out of the doldrums. It may be appropriate that Godsall has joined skating from the life-saving world. From deep water, she realistically suggests, to thin ice.

It will be some time before the new broom sweeps clean but there is a hope, indeed an expectation, that a new spirit will at least imbue the proceedings in Basingstoke this week.

Steven Cousins, fresh from his training ground in Canada, will seek, surely successfully, his seventh successive men's title, thereby surpassing the domestic achievements of John Curry and Robin Cousins (no relation).

But Jenna Arrowsmith, an unexpected winner of the women's championship last year, at the age of only 14, has had to withdraw because of injury. The way seems open for either the runner-up from last year, Zoe Jones, now also 15, to succeed her Swindon companion, or for the Scot, Stephanie Main, to regain the title she unexpectedly surrendered a year ago.

As for the pairs and ice dancers, probably the least said the better, until the new regime, which is receiving sponsorship from Tesa, a German industrial company, succeeds in encouraging much higher standards of performance.

Mr Average Tory MP, this is your wife

The Tory wife, that endangered species, never fails to live up to her potential as a subject for television documentaries. She invariably cuts a splendid dash and she is imbued with the philosophy of Stand By Your Man even if she would never admit to a familiarity with the works of Tammy Wynette.

A composite picture of the wife of a Tory MP, based on last night's Modern Times: Tory Wives (BBC2), would consist of a handsome woman with an upper middle-class accent wearing an expression of amused resignation. She would be happy, if not fulfilled, and she would have listened to and taken the following advice: "If they loosen up a bit they realise that their husband is happier doing his own thing and if they fall in with his plans they'll be happier."

But what about Tory wives who pronounce themselves bored and unfulfilled? "I tell them to find someone worse off than themselves and help them." Does it work? "Not always. Some go away and commit suicide, but you can't win them all."

All the quotes above are from Sally Neubert, whose husband is Sir Michael, the Member for Romford. Lady Neubert is Tory wife-in-chief, in that she is chairwoman of the Conservative Wives Association. She stiffens resolve. Her certainty is so terrifying that John Major could well wish that she was Chief Whip.

Some Tory wives are well aware of their bizarre and vulnerable position and put on displays of splendid objectivity in order to show that they are nobody's fool. "I don't like politicians as a breed, I think they're a ghastly lot of egotists."

So spake Vanessa Hannam (Sir John, Exeter), adding: "I've seen very nice, normal men whom I've really liked who have got into Westminster and it's guaranteed that within six months they've changed, they've become infected with this great arrogance.

"They're not house-trained, you see. They become house-trained again about halfway through the recess, for about a fortnight you've got a monster there, then they become a normal, lovely person again." It was not clear whether this was based on observations in her own home, or other people's.

What the programme, entertaining as it was, failed to penetrate sufficiently was the matter of the Tory wife who is brought into play when it suits the Tory husband, even, as in the case of Judith Mellor, when the wife has been humiliated.

Gail Redwood (John, Wokingham) is not prone to humiliation but strange things happen even to her. She went to work at British Airways one day to hear from colleagues, who had listened to the radio, that her husband proposed to run against John Major for the leadership.

REVIEW

Peter Barnard

When Mrs Redwood was asked during the campaign to attend her husband's final press conference she "went up for it ... it was like going to the moon for the day". This passivity can of course be overstated: coalminers and journalists do not take their spouses to work, after all.

But politicians are adept at treating their wives like manicured lawns, to be kept in trim behind high hedges except when they might serve as the backdrop for a photo-opportunity. "You're very much five paces behind," said Anita Townsend (Cyril, former Member for Bexleyheath). "But this is always the case with women, isn't it? You live through your husband and your children and are defined by them."

The Channel 4 documentary series Dispatches put Sotheby's under the hammer last night in a programme the auction house refused to take part in, either directly or through written statement. The essence of the allegation against Sotheby's is that it auctions antiquities knowing their provenance to be dubious at best.

This claim is not new. Four years ago James Hodges, an employee in the antiquities department, was convicted on three charges of theft and false accounting. At issue and, Dispatches believes, contributing to the jury's decision to acquit on 18 other charges, was whether Hodges had the tacit approval of Sotheby's.

Dispatches produced an impressive amount of documentation which appeared to show that antiquities illegally excavated in southern Italy found their way to Sotheby's auction rooms via Geneva without benefit of valid export licences.

This does not prove that Sothebys knew how the treasures were obtained and the only statement in the programme coming directly from Sotheby's was a remark made by Felicity Nicolson, its head of antiquities, when she gave evidence at the Hodges trial: "Our business is to sell antiquities. I am not there to make a judgment as to where they have come from."

Ben Elton is either a great stand-up or an overbearing pain in the neck, depending on your viewpoint. He was interviewed by Bob Monkhouse in Funny for Money (BBC2). I think that this would have taught us more about comic technique if it had been a conversation, for Monkhouse is technically brilliant.

Elton did explain his 100 mph delivery: in his early days at the Comedy Store he dared not pause or the hecklers would take over. "To pause was a revelation for me. In the first eight years as a comic I don't think I drew breath."

Elton regards himself as a comedy writer who performs his own material rather than a comic per se and he is probably correct: his writing for others, including The Young Ones and Blackadder, is some of the best modern material in the genre.

BBC1 9.30pm

Kieran Prendiville's second series, in spite of its token scattering of oilrig women and the long-suffering landlady of the Greenacres boarding house, is mostly about men doing what a man's gotta do North Sea oil-wise. But through the eternal driving rain of Aberdeen and the murky, eerie beauty of the Osprey Explorer where they work, it's sometimes difficult to see what the men actually are doing. (Once on shore they do a lot of arm wrestling in pubs but that doesn't count.) A deadline has been set for Osprey to hit oil, otherwise the rig will be docked — so tonight there's much tense, monosyllabic muttering. Watch for familiar faces from Dangerfield, EastEnders and more — and stand by for a splendid cliffhanger finale.

It's a tough life in the military police (BBC1, 10.20pm)

Redcaps: Shiny Boots, Shiny Mind
BBC1 10.20pm

No sooner has Osprey jutted off into the fog than it's forward march to the Royal Military Police training centre, Chichester, where squaddies appear to undergo the worst bullying ever seen in a series about Army-style training ... 28 of them over an 18-week course are routinely humilated and insulted or, as their CO puts it, "broken down, so they can be rebuilt". Astonishingly, only 12 drop out and when they graduate they will "keep check" on British troops in troublespots. Last year they were involved in 38 murder inquiries, 400 serious woundings and more than 700 assaults. But they must always maintain, says their sergeant, "shiny boots and a shiny mind".

Short Stories: Faulty Tours
Channel 4 8.30pm

The funny — tragic — tale of a culture clash between sophisticated Russians and a go-getting Blackpool tour operator. Bob Walters is fine when he's catering to Brits but misfires badly when it comes to dealing with a well-educated group of Muscovites. They don't know what to make of Blackpool's Golden Mile, never mind the Bee Gees ("Who?") switching on the lights. The abrupt defection of Mr Walters's interpreter (she goes home to Moscow) doesn't help, either. Eventually the frustrated Russians bunk off on their own to study cathedrals and the "real green and pleasant land we came to see" — in Cheshire. When asked where they would like to send Mr Walters, Tanya says: "The hotspots of the Caucasus." Something of a war zone, that.

Doctors in the Dock
BBC2 10.00pm

Unfit to Operate is an extraordinary documentary. If the rest of the series — on doctors who have been disciplined, for whatever reason — intrigues as this does, it should win awards. Nicholas Siddle was a brilliant, if arrogant, consultant gynaecologist — that he agreed to comment on his own rise and fall in the medical hierarchy is, perhaps, indicative of the man's egotism. But co-operate he did, and a sorry tale unfolds of bodged operations with patients' testimonies on how they narrowly survived Siddle's attempts at keyhole surgery. This man is a pioneer of hormone replacement therapy and once held down a thriving private practice. Today he is allegedly penniless and unemployed.

RFU plans run into initial opposition from clubs and rival unions

Mixed response to rugby revolution

BY DAVID HANDS, RUGBY CORRESPONDENT

SCARCELY had the ink dried on the propsoals of the Rugby Football Union (RFU) for a professional future than the other home unions, upon whose co-operation some of the most significant changes depend, began to express concern. If England are to be involved in a five nations' championship played in early summer, they will have to compromise.

The report of the RFU commission into open rugby, published yesterday and distributed to its 2,000 member clubs today, demolishes the traditional playing structure of the game in England. It deals with the contractual and transfer elements implicit in a professional game, and proposes a framework of domestic and European club rugby, building into an international championship played in late April and May rather than its traditional dates from January to March.

Clubs must choose 45
Samoans under fire 45

Essentially permissive in nature, like the regulations laid down by the International Rugby Football Board (IRFB) in Paris last August which turned the game professional, the RFU seeks a far more ordered season, a product attractive to sponsors and television aimed at producing a successful England side which is "fundamental to the continuing prosperity of the game".

The suggested new season would start with domestic league rugby, followed by European and cross-border (effectively Anglo-Welsh) club games, some played on Sundays. Incoming tours, national and provincial, would precede Christmas, before the resumption of league and cup rugby, then the end-of-season international climax.

The report acknowledges the need to raise substantial sums of money for the payment of players, with such television-friendly fixtures as Charity Shield-style matches in August between the league and cup winners in England and Wales. Back-to-back internationals at the end of the season would, however, undermine the winter programme of the BBC, whose hold on the domestic television contract is already under substantial threat, though Bill Bishop, the RFU president, denied his union was on the verge of a deal with BSkyB.

"Whatever we say we will have to work hand in hand with our colleagues in the five nations, who have their own priorities," John Jeavons-Fellows, the RFU's representative on the IRFB, said. "We know some other nations don't want to play in the middle of May and I expect there will have to be some compromise."

The RFU's aim, to produce a season in which international rugby is not cluttered up with club commitments, met with practical and philosophical objections. "The [Scottish Rugby] Union has never discussed going into May," Bill Hogg, the SRU chief executive, said. "We have already moved out of January and accepted putting the international season back two weeks into April in 1997. By May you are starting to move into other sports, and there's the question of tours."

Bishop accepted the doubts over the feasibility of switching the championship to May. "We've been trying to move it to later in the season for some time," he said. "But I'm surprised they have gone as far as they did."

Speaking on Radio 5 Live, Bishop added: "I must stress this is only a report. The committee may well not accept it. It was a blank piece of paper and it's now up to the committee and the clubs to decide the way forward. We would have to get the agreement of other nations, which may not be easy."

Philip Browne, of the Irish RFU, complained about the concentrated cost to spectators, and Edward Jones, from the Welsh Rugby Union, dismissed as not feasible the move to May. "We need to find what is good for us all and best for the game, not just for one party," Jones said.

The commission also clashes with England's leading clubs in its preference for a dual contract, one between player and club enmeshed with another between player and country, though the proposed expansion of the second division to 14 clubs removes the threat of relegation to Newcastle, who are bottom of the table, and with it the threat of legal action by Sir John Hall.

Sir John, the chairman of Newcastle United Sporting Clubs, had threatened an injunction for restraint of trade if the continuation of the RFU's moratorium this season prevented Newcastle from playing newly-acquired players. He said last night that, though the moratorium, with its 120-day eligibility period, remains, his board would accept the revised situation if no relegation at the lower level is confirmed by the National Clubs Association today and by the RFU general committee on November 17.

However, Sir John criticised the contractual proposals. "The primary contract must be between player and club," he said. "We will be putting all our players on three or four-year contracts and, if the open market is allowed, signing-on fees will form part of a future transfer system."

The commission accepts that clubs will offer contracts this season, but, as a potential employer, the RFU is in a stronger position — for now — than almost every club, and must be able to guarantee the availability of players in promotional exercises. Contracts would be lodged at Twickenham and, though the senior clubs have talked of a relatively small percentage of any transfer fee remaining with the player involved, the commission insists on transfer monies remaining with the respective clubs.

New legislation would require only a seven-day registration period in the national leagues — 30 days elsewhere — and there would be no restriction on the number of players from other home unions, though nothing was said about overseas players. Rugby league players, likewise, would be allowed a free passage — which is more, perhaps, than the commission's findings will receive.

Main recommendations of the RFU Commission

- Five nations' championship to move to May
- All first-division clubs to play European/cross-border games
- Clubs' playing success to be rewarded
- Government funding to strengthen club infrastructure
- Players to have dual contracts with club and country
- Transfer fees payable between clubs, not to players
- Seven-day registration period
- RFU to be run by board of management

Bates holds firm in boardroom dispute at Chelsea

BY JOHN GOODBODY

KEN BATES, the irascible Chelsea chairman, was yesterday standing firm in his boardroom struggle with the director, Matthew Harding, for control of the FA Carling Premiership club.

The rift between Bates, whose astute determination saved Chelsea from extinction in the 1980s, and Harding, reputed to be among Britain's 100 richest men, now seems irreparable.

Bates said: "After what has gone on, what has been said, I cannot see how we can continue to work together. He has been nice to my face but said unpleasant things about me behind my back." Harding has said that he wants to succeed Bates, who has been chairman for 13 years.

The split between the pair came into the open last Thursday when Harding resigned from Chelsea Village, the holding company which owns the football club. Bates, 63, is chairman of Chelsea Village and the football club, on whose board Harding, 41, remains as a director.

Over the past two years, Harding has put £26.5 million into the club, including buying the freehold of Stamford Bridge for £16.5 million to secure the club's future at its traditional home.

Harding has also loaned £5 million to complete the North Stand and a further £5 million for new players. What is unusual about Harding is that he has preferred loan investments to shares in Chelsea Village.

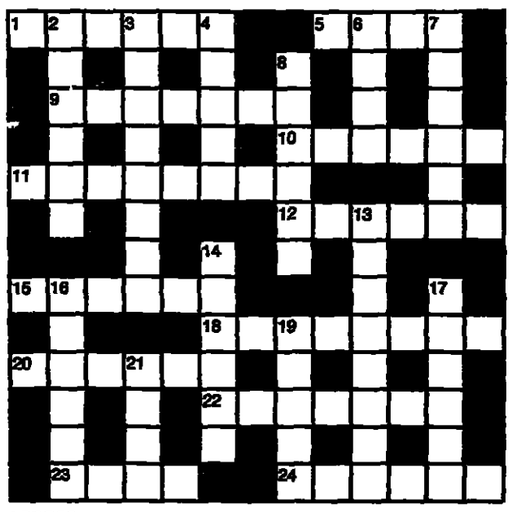

Bates has said that Harding must pay £100 million if he wants to take control of Chelsea, including at least £50 million for Bates's majority shareholding of Chelsea Village. A further £30 million is needed to complete the rebuilding at Stamford Bridge to give the ground a seating capacity of 45,000.

He is concerned that, unless there is further work, the capacity next season will only be 33,800, of which 2,800 supporters will be sitting on benches.

Bates said: "I have not had one good reason why I should go. Anyway, I do not want to. I have made this club my life and we are now beginning to see the fruits of all the work that has been put in over the last 13 years."

Ferguson loses appeal against ban

DUNCAN FERGUSON, the Everton striker, yesterday lost his appeal against a 12-match ban imposed by the Scottish Football Association (SFA). The SFA's appeals tribunal rejected his plea for leniency over the ban, which followed an on-field assault on John McStay, of Raith, in April 1994 that also resulted in him being jailed for three months. The tribunal decided that the suspension, one match of which Ferguson has already served, should run from yesterday.

Everton were hoping that Ferguson, who is to be released from Barlinnie Prison, Glasgow, on November 22, would be available to play three days later.

Tony Higgins, the secretary of the Scottish Professional Footballers' Association, said: "We felt that, at the very least, if the tribunal was to uphold the 12-match ban they would back-date it to his entry into Barlinnie Prison.

"Given what the player has been through, and that he has been through the court's system, it was felt the time was right for the tribunal to show compassion. The player has been punished twice for the same crime," Higgins added.

The decision effectively rules Ferguson out of football for the rest of this year. "Duncan will be devastated by the news because when he is released I am sure the first thing he will have wanted was to get back to playing as soon as possible, but he will now have to miss games before he is back in competitive action," Higgins said.

England face 'frog in the blender'

Alan Lee says a novice slow bowler could pose unforeseen problems to touring batsmen

A TEENAGE spin bowler whose action has memorably been likened to "a frog in a blender" will confront England here in Kimberley today amid indications that the Test series in South Africa might not, as has long been predicted, be the exclusive territory of fast bowlers.

Paul Adams was daunted by the attention when he arrived with the South Africa A side in Kimberley yesterday, which is not surprising. He is an 18-year-old from a poor family in the Cape Flats and has played only one senior provincial match for Western Province. In that game, however, his six wickets in the second innings won a game played on the Centurion Park ground that next week will stage the opening Test in this series.

It is too late for Adams to be included in the South Africa side. They have already named a 12 with an attack based on pace. But he is so unusual that this country is warming to him. Adams is that rarest of modern rarities, a left-arm wrist-spinner. His stock ball is the left-armer's googly, which spins away from the right-handed batsman, but his variety and control is such that, with sublime fancy, he is already being labelled the South African Shane Warne.

His extraordinarily unorthodox action features a whirl of arms and legs and he delivers the ball with his head pointing at the turf. But he threatens to be a menace to England's Test preparation. More than anything, from the four-day game starting today, they need an innings of substance from Robin Smith. More than anything, Smith dislikes wrist spin.
